PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 9, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in the higher regions of life there is peace, and we start to-day in the altitudes where God is and carry the influence of this precious divine moment out into the business of our daily life. Amid all the conflict of opinion and clash of interest there is one place where every heart beats in accord, where every spirit is reverent. It is in Thy presence. We ask Thee to send us forth with a spirit that comes into our hearts at this moment of our calling upon Thy name. Imbue us with wisdom and grace and power for the duties of this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. CUMMINS) resumed the chair.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 2786. An act authorizing the sale of lands in Gregory County, S. Dak.;

S. 3263. An act to authorize the construction of flood-control and improvement works in Minnesota River and Big Stone Lake between the States of Minnesota and South Dakota;

S. 3779. An act to authorize the Ozark Forest road improvement district of Baxter County, Ark., to construct and maintain a bridge across the White River, near Norfork, Ark.;

H. R. 685. An act for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls;

H. R. 687. An act for the relief of Frank Pinkley;

H. R. 6077. An act for the relief of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif.;

H. R. 8645. An act for the relief of Lawrence Bendich and Anthony Vezich;

H. R. 11175. An act for the public sale of customhouse building and site at Kennebunkport, Me.; and

S. J. Res. 167. A joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NORRIS. I present a petition to the Congress of the United States signed by several hundred of the leading citizens of the State of Nebraska, headed by the governor, signed also by the members of the supreme court of the State, in which they protest against the treatment by Japanese officials of the Korean people, and ask Congress to take such action as may be necessary to bring about the proper treatment and justice. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Vermont, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the parole of Federal prisoners, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Kern County Chamber of Commerce, of Bakersfield, Calif., praying that relief be granted to the peoples of Central Europe and Armenia, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the National Federation of Employees, of San Francisco, Calif., praying for an increase in the salaries of inspectors in the Steamboat-Inspection Service, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KENYON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Des Moines, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the public protection of maternity and infancy, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Gowrie and Winneshiek County, Iowa, remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 514) thereon.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the bill (S. 4166) to provide for election contests in the Senate of the United States, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 515) thereon.

Mr. WATSON, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6238) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of zinc ores and manufactures thereof in the United States, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 512) thereon.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 513) thereon. I give notice that I shall endeavor to bring up the bill on Monday next for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD STRIKES.

Mr. CALDER. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 346, submitted yesterday by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Reading Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce is hereby authorized and directed to conduct an inquiry, by subcommittee or otherwise, respecting any existing strike of interstate railroad employees not conducted or authorized by any recognized organization of railroad employees. For this purpose such committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby empowered to sit during the recess and sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as may be deemed advisable, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer and such other clerical assistance as may be necessary. A report of the results of such investigation, including a statement of the causes and purposes of such strike and the merits of the controversy involved therein shall be made to the Senate as soon as practicable, accompanied by such recommendations as may be deemed proper. The expenses of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the resolution, but I do not know just when the committee will get a chance to make such an investigation with all the business it has before it at this session.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, may I say, by way of reply to the Senator from Minnesota, the resolution specifically provides that a subcommittee may make the inquiry? I do not doubt that the investigation can not be as searching as a sociological survey, but what is needed now, in default of the appointment of the wage board, is some body of men which may bring the facts to public attention. There is no other possible means of mobilizing that public opinion which may induce the men to return to work pending the ultimate arbitrament of the dispute.

Mr. KELLOGG. There is no objection to that, but the committee spent a great deal of time during last autumn, as the chairman knows, in investigating strikes and the labor question pertaining to the railroads, and made recommendations to Congress which Congress did not approve of.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, under the law which we passed, when the board provided for therein was appointed, there would be a court that would have jurisdiction and whose duty it would be to investigate this very thing.

Mr. McCORMICK. There would have been a board appointed if the executive branch of the Government had been functioning with full energy.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has introduced this resolution for the reason that no such board has been appointed.

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely.

Mr. NORRIS. And at the present time there is no official instrumentality by which the people of the country may be informed as to what the facts are in this particular case.

Mr. McCORMICK. And so lend their support. The responsible elected officers of the brotherhoods have been deprived of that.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. I am entirely in sympathy with the resolution, although I might not be in favor of it if the proper officials had been selected and were functioning. But the people of the country ought to know what the truth is about this matter, and, as an educational proposition, I believe the investigation should be made. I understand that is the object of the resolution, and it seems to me that the investigation ought to be made.

Mr. McCORMICK. There are facts which I could lay before the Senate, but they are ex parte, prejudiced, if you please, by the judgment of the persons who have brought them to me. We are confronted with a very grave situation, brought about, I think, by the unhappy failure to appoint the wage board provided by the law. No hurt can be done that I see, and I feel that some great good may flow from prompt action by the Senate. If action be not prompt, action will be useless.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment of the committee was, on page 1, line 12, after the word "stenographer," to insert the words "at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.). The morning business is closed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to consideration of Senate bill 3792, the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Dillingham	Kirby	Phipps
Brandegee	Elkins	McCormick	Pomerene
Calder	Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Ransdell
Capper	Gay	McNary	Sheppard
Chamberlain	Gronna	Nelson	Smoot
Comer	Harrison	New	Spencer
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Wadsworth
Cummins	Kellogg	Nugent	Watson
Dial	Kenyon	Phelan

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] is detained by illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are absent in attendance at a meeting of the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] are absent on official business.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent, due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. COLT, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. WARREN answered to their names when called.

Mr. LENROOT, Mr. GORE, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. KNOX, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. MOSES, Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. GLASS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in reference to the Frelinghuysen amendment I wish to read from an article in the Washington Post of this morning:

> When Chairman WADSWORTH and the advocates of compulsory training finally were forced yesterday to concede defeat some adroit political maneuvers were necessary.
> An effort was made to prevent a direct vote, in order to save certain Senators from the embarrassment of committing themselves. For the time being the effort has proved successful.
> Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, an advocate of compulsory training, offered an amendment providing for "voluntary" training instead of "compulsory" training as being better than nothing. Senator LODGE, also a supporter of compulsory training, admitted the certainty of its defeat, and, being unable to obtain what he preferred, would take the substitute.

Mr. President, we thus see the great cause of universal compulsory military training being slaughtered by its friends. I do not think, however, that anyone in the country is going to be misled about it. The fact that conscription in time of peace is killed by its friends, after admitting that it is going to be killed by its enemies, will not change the situation in respect to it.

The Frelinghuysen amendment provides, just as my amendment provides, that sections 56 and 57, providing for registration and for conscription, shall be eliminated from the bill, and I want to say that if any Senator who is in favor of conscription in time of peace is going to vote for the Frelinghuysen amendment on the ground that he is sidestepping a vote on conscription in time of peace, he is going to be badly mistaken, because the Frelinghuysen amendment provides in terms, just as mine does, that conscription shall be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. President, this attitude upon the part of our Republican friends who are in control of the organization is the same attitude that has been displayed throughout this controversy.

In the House the Military Affairs Committee was in favor of conscription in time of peace and by a vote of 11 to 9 authorized the favorable report on such a measure. So much opposition developed in their own party and in the country that the organization in the House was forced to withdraw that favorable recommendation, and thereupon the House passed a bill without compulsory military training.

In the Senate the situation was exactly the same, except the Republican organization of the committee reported out the bill and has undertaken to pass it. They have not passed it because there are apparently at least 40 Democrats and maybe more opposed to it, and probably at least 15 Republicans and maybe more who are opposed to fastening conscription upon the people in time of peace.

But the situation can not be camouflaged by adroit amendments. The facts are that the Republican organization in both Houses have ceaselessly worked to fasten universal military training or conscription in time of peace upon the people of this country.

I want to congratulate those Republicans who put their country before party and who have stood steadfastly against this measure which would Prussianize the American Army and would belie everything that America has stood for during all of her history.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that this great question of the reorganization of our Army—and universal military training is a part of that general scheme—has drifted into the channel of partisan politics. I do not know what credit the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] and those who stand with him in this matter can claim by way of party advantage in this connection, because the distinguished leader of the Democratic Party has advocated it at this session of Congress.

I have been almost charged with treason by some of my friends in the days gone by simply because I differed from some others as to the conduct of some of the bureaus and departments of the Government. That was an indication of treason in the eyes of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee and some others who felt as he did—that the King could do no wrong and that no one under him could do any wrong; but here, where no departmental methods are involved, but where a great scheme of Army organization is involved, the distinguished leader of the so-called antimilitaristic Senators differs radically from our party leader on this very great question. So, from a party standpoint, I do not see what my Democratic friends are going to claim by way of party advantage, because the President has advocated military training, nor can I see anything that our Republican friends are going to gain by doing what the Senator from Tennessee charges them with doing, in deserting the proposition which they have heretofore advocated, simply for the reason that both the President of the United States and, I think, the majority of the Republicans both in the House and in the Senate favor universal compulsory military training.

Mr. President, in support of my position that the President of the United States, the leader of the Democratic Party, has advocated this proposal, I am going to call the attention of the Senate, and particularly of the Senator from Tennessee, to a letter addressed by the President of the United States some days ago, through the Secretary of War, to the leaders on the Democratic side of the House. In that letter the President said:

> I am told that a caucus of the Democratic Members of the House of Representatives has been called to consider pending military legislation, and the suggestion has been made that a resolution be adopted committing the Democratic membership of the House against the policy of general military training. In the present circumstances it would seem to me unfortunate to make a party issue upon this subject, particularly since within a few months the party will assemble in convention and declare the principles upon which it deems it wise to commit itself in a national election. The present disturbed state of the world does not permit such sureness with regard to America's obligations as to allow us lightly to decide upon this great question upon purely military grounds while the demonstrated advantages to the youth of the country which came from military service in the war plainly suggest that in the national interest, quite apart from military considerations, the moderate and carefully conducted course of military training may have the highest possible advantage.

That is the appeal of a patriot, Mr. President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think that that language of the President of the United States justifies the statement made a few moments ago by the Senator from Oregon that the President of the United States was in favor of compulsory military training? It rather indicates to me that he desired the matter not to be made a question of party decision at this time, but to await the verdict of the national convention.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it appeals for both. If I can construe the language, it appeals for the training of the young men of this country under some system; and in view of the fact that the question before the House was compulsory military training, and that was what the Democratic caucus acted upon, I think it is susceptible of the construction that the President meant universal military training. In any event, I cite it for the purpose of showing that the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], if you please, are violating the request of the President in undertaking to make this great question a party question. They are likely to subject themselves to the charge of disloyalty to their chief, the leader of their party.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator read the letter, because I was shocked by his statement that the President of the United States had taken a position in favor of compulsory universal military training, because I had no such impression myself; and the reading of the letter just now confirms me in my feeling that he merely objected to having the representatives of the party take a position at this time which would bind the party before the national convention had met. He asked for a withholding of opinion, rather than to have the party go on record in favor of universal military training.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will read a part of it again for the Senator's benefit. I still claim that my construction of the President's letter is right, and it is not hard for the Senator to put his own construction on it. I am going to say here, without the fear of successful contradiction, that some of the distinguished men who are leading this fight against universal military training led the fight against conscription during the war, and would, if their views had prevailed, have led America and the Allies to defeat.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know to whom the Senator refers. I recognize no member of the minority party in the Chamber at this time or within the last few days who opposed conscription or the draft law.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, an old lawyer out in my section of the country, when he was stating a proposition of law to a justice of the peace, said, "If your honor does not believe what I say about this, I refer you to my library." I refer the Senator to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the period from April 6, 1917, to the time the selective-service act was passed, May 18, 1917.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator, of course, does not refer to me.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the Senator from Nebraska only begs the question. The Secretary of War, in a public statement, has announced that he is in favor of universal military training; and most certainly he, as the representative of the War Department, could not utter such a policy without the approval of the President. The President himself has plainly stated in the public press—and it has been printed all over the country—that he is in favor of military training, and has changed his policy; and there has been no denial whatsoever from the President of those public statements.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator tolerate another interruption? I think it hardly follows, because one of the Secretaries takes a position on any question, that that binds the President. For instance, the Postmaster General has taken a position for the Government ownership of telephones and telegraphs, but that did not represent and does not bind the President of the United States. Such representatives of the Government have been free to make their own personal recommendations from time to time, but they never have been considered as binding the President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, permit me to read again a part of what the President said, and something that I did not read before:

> The present disturbed state of the world does not permit such sureness with regard to America's obligations as to allow us lightly to decide upon this great question upon purely military grounds while the demonstrated advantages to the youth of the country which came from military service in the war plainly suggest that in the national interest quite apart from military considerations the moderate and carefully conducted course of military training may have the highest possible advantage.

What did we have in the war that the President commends as having brought us great military advantage? We had a system which the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Tennessee both opposed, and that was the compulsory system, compelling the young men of this country to realize and to know that for the benefits which our Government and laws gave to them they owed a duty to this country that they were bound to perform when the time came that their services were needed. Oh, Mr. President, the pacifists of this country who opposed the draft law are at this time opposing anything like the training of the young men of this country, and I am not charging the Senators who are differing from my position in this matter with having been or with being pacifists.

Further, the President in his letter says:

> In our discussion of the subject you will recall I gave my approval in principle to the various very moderate training projects suggested by the General Staff, and I would be very glad to have you convey to appropriate Members of the House, who will attend the caucus, my strong feeling against action by the caucus which will tend to interpose an arbitrary party determination to the consideration which this subject should receive from the best thought of the Members of the House, considering alike the national emergencies which may confront us and the great disciplinary and other advantages which such a system plainly promises for the young men of the country.

What was the mild system of training that the General Staff suggested? It was a sterner system of compulsory training than is included in this bill, and that bill came before us with the approval of the Secretary of War, and it was through the Secretary of War that this communication of the President was transmitted to the Democratic leaders of the House.

But I will not undertake to say that the leaders of the House on the Democratic side were guilty of treason because they differed from their leader. I simply say that it was unfortunate that they did not follow the President's lead, and I believe he did have the majority sentiment of the Republican Party with him in the House of Representatives on that proposition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator put in the RECORD the page of the RECORD on which the President's letter, which he has just read, is printed?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Page 2837, volume 5, of the RECORD of this session.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the date? I mean the date of the RECORD which contains it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. February 13, 1920.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I also add, for the benefit of the RECORD, that the President's letter was published in the Washington Star of February 9, 1920?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, with relation to the inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska, whether the President's letter was a thoroughgoing indorsement of universal compulsory military training or not, it seems to me, from listening to what the Senator has just read, that it certainly was an appeal to his party not to decide against that system.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no doubt about it. It was plainly an appeal for them to leave it to the free and frank discussion of Members of the House, without undertaking to divide on party lines.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. The distinguished Senator from Oregon was formerly chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, and I am sure he is as familiar as anyone can possibly be with the military affairs of this country during the war. Is there any record of the number of young men who served in the late war which shows the percentage of those who enlisted voluntarily, and also the percentage of those who had to be conscripted and who served in the late war?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no doubt that The Adjutant General's Department can give the Senator that information. I can not lay my hands on it right now, but those figures are obtainable from The Adjutant General.

Mr. GRONNA. In the Senator's opinion, is it fair to assume that a large proportion of those who served in the late war were those who volunteered?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No. A small proportion, as compared with over four million that were raised under the selective service, were volunteers; less than a million, I think. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who has given this matter a good deal of attention, says it was something less than a million, and we raised over 4,000,000 men altogether.

Mr. GRONNA. So that although we had conscription, there were more than a million, or a million, we will say—one-fourth—who volunteered, and who did not have to be drafted. Is that correct?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is substantially correct. I do not want the Senator to understand that I am criticizing the volunteer. No man in this world has a higher regard for the young men who volunteered their services than I; and it was for that very reason that I was a strong advocate of the selective-service law, because I wanted to protect the men who had volunteered, and compel others, who owed the same duty to their country, to go to its relief.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me another remark, what led me to ask the Senator the question was his statement referring to those who were opposed to conscription, and also, in connection with that, I think, to use the Senator's language, "those who would have led our country to defeat." That was, of course, a rather broad statement. The Senator evidently had reference to some Member of this body.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no; oh, no. The Senator misunderstood me. I had no intention of suggesting that any Senator here would intentionally do anything that would have led our country to defeat; but I say that the policy of raising an army simply by the volunteer system would have led our country to defeat. It must have done it. We could not have raised 4,000,000 men, we would not have raised the 2,000,000 that went over there and did the fighting, by the volunteer system. That is what I meant.

Mr. GRONNA. I am glad the Senator modifies his statement. I think he will find by examining the RECORD that his statement is as I stated it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to say to the Senator that I do not share the feeling that a great many have that the Senator and others who opposed the draft law were not loyal to our country. The fact is, I want to say to the Senator, that no man proved his loyalty any more than the Senator did, because he had two or three sons over there, and two or three nephews as well.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that it would not be well for any Senator or anyone else to face the Senator from North Dakota and say that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I believe that, too. I believe that of other Senators as well. I have the greatest regard for Senators who differed from those of us who advocated the selective-service law. I have the highest regard for them. I think their judgment was bad, that is all, and I think if their course had been adopted by Congress as the course to pursue in raising an army, the Allies would have met with defeat.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator so much, but this is a question of very great importance; and the trouble was during the war that it was almost impossible for any man who did not agree with the plan proposed to be permitted to discuss the question intelligently. I will say to the Senator that I know that there were men who were not unalterably opposed to the system of the draft, and I think I may say there were several of the Members who opposed the draft because they thought it was possible to get an army by volunteers, but, if such a thing as that should be impossible, of course they would favor the Senator's forced plan of a draft. But, as I said, it was impossible during the war to discuss that question in an intelligent way, because, if any question was asked or any objection was made trying even to correct some of the provisions in the bills, it was immediately construed to mean that a man was opposed to the whole scheme, which was not true.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think if the Senator will refer to the discussion then, he will find that Senators and Representatives were not afraid to discuss it. There were no abler addresses made against the selective-service bill than some that were made in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, and by leaders in both parties. It was not a question of party. It was a question of difference in policy. I thought then, and I think now, that but for the selective-service law the Allies would have lost the war. The Senator would doubtless differ from me.

There is no absolute need now for training the young men of this country, but, as the President of the United States has suggested, in the present troubled condition of the world we do not know what we will need. Some Senators predict here that there is no danger of war. In 1915 I introduced in this body the first selective-service bill. Some thought I was wholly wrong, but as a matter of fact it was to get this country ready to fight. If that bill had passed, if Congress could have been induced to pass that bill in 1915, so that an army of young men might have been trained in 1916, there is no question that we would have kept out of this war. Why, it was the boast of Germany and Germany's friends there and here, first, that America was so busy making a dollar that she would not raise an army, and, second, if she raised an army they could not get over, and, third, if they got over they would not fight. How grievously mistaken she was on all three of these propositions!

If we had shown that we were willing to raise an army by passing a selective-service act and if we had put under the colors of our country a million or two young men for training, Germany would have hesitated long before insulting our flag. It is my opinion that Germany would not have dared to have brought the United States into the cause of the Allies if we had had a million men in training. She only brought us in as it was by continued destruction of American life and property and continued insult to the American flag. We did not see fit to train our boys. They said, therefore, that we were not going to get into the war.

The distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] who is leading the fight against this measure, and I hope the Senator will listen to me, as late as the 29th of April, 1916, opposing so-called militarism, opposing the raising of an army in a safe and sane way, said in a speech before the Senate that will be found at page 831 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, in speaking of the federalization of the militia:

> The greatest accomplishment of this measure, however, is to be found in the plan of making the State militia an effective body of first-line defense. Originally the Secretary of War had another plan. It was known as the continental army scheme. That scheme provided that there should be a continental army composed of 400,000 men enlisted to serve three years, either one month or two months in a year. That after the end of the third year they shall go into the reserve for three years. It was expected that 133,000 of these could be recruited a year, and at the end of three years the 400,000 would be raised. This plan brought up quite a controversy, and the committee was of the opinion that (1) the men could not be recruited in that way, and (2) that the training would not be sufficient to make them soldiers. Of course, the plan would have been even more expensive than the federalization of the militia, and in the judgment of the committee nothing like so efficient.
> Again, the plan, if it could have been made efficient, would have been a tremendous step toward militarism in this country, in that it would have led to a tremendous standing army. The result was the committee unanimously voted in favor of the federalization of the State militia.

Raising 400,000 men under the proposed scheme that was then suggested would have raised an immense standing army and would have placed our country in danger of becoming militaristic! Think of it as compared with raising more than 4,000,000 men less than one year later!

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The facts are absolutely well known as to my position in 1916. It is impossible to have any misunderstanding about it. My position was that the first 500,000 men should be brought into the Army by the volunteer system. That was the extent of the amendment and precisely what it provided for. I voted for the draft bill in time of war, of course. There can not be any mistake about my attitude. I would vote for such a bill in another emergency, but I am not in favor of conscription in time of peace.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator voted against the provision in the so-called Kahn bill to increase the Army to 250,000 men.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not recall when that was.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will read from another speech of the Senator, made on the 13th of May, 1916——

Mr. McKELLAR. It may be so. I have never favored a large standing Army. I think my position on that question is well understood. In a colloquy between myself and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] some time ago I expressed the view that at this time we ought to have a standing Army of something like 300,000 men for the protection of the United States. I think so now. There is no secrecy about it. There is nothing unusual about it. It is open and aboveboard and the Senator can not misquote me. My attitude is the same that it has always been.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not charging the Senator with doing anything in secret. I do not usually indulge in that kind of thing myself; but the Senator does not hesitate to get up here and charge Democrats and Republicans with jugglery and party machine work, which is not justified by anything that has happened here.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, every Senator here knows that the principal question in this bill is universal compulsory military training. The amendment offered——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator makes that statement. I will ask the Senator how many times he attended the meetings of the Committee on Military Affairs when it was considering this bill? There are other important questions in it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I attended practically every meeting that I was invited to attend. I was not on the subcommittee, and, of course, did not attend the subcommittee meetings. I think one or two times I was invited to attend those.

Let me say this about this particular amendment. We all know that the amendment which was first offered raised the question fairly and squarely, so that every Senator who voted "yea" voted for military training and those who voted "nay" voted against military training. There was not any doubt about it. The other amendment introduced later, and which under the rules has priority, does not present that question in the square way that I think it ought to be presented in the Senate, and when it is presented in that square way, if we can get it up I say it will be overwhelmingly defeated. I believe a majority of both parties in the Senate will vote against it. I ask the Senator from Oregon if he is willing to have a fair and square vote on the proposition?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Oregon has never been afraid to take a fair and square vote on anything.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not care to be interrupted any more. Some of us, as a step toward saving something from this wreck, are in favor of the voluntary training of the young men of this country. Senators are not interested in these personal controversies. They are not interested in these differences between the Senator and myself. What Senators and the people are interested in is questions that involve the national welfare, not merely of our Government, but our civilization, if you please. The Senator from Tennessee is a most honorable man. I make no charges affecting his honor. He and I differ very radically on very many propositions. We differed all the way through practically on the question of the raising of an army to prosecute the war. When the selective-service law was up for consideration in 1916, let us see what the Senator said in a speech delivered by him on Saturday, May 13, 1916. I am citing it to show that the Senator makes mistakes sometimes, and he may be making some now. He said:

> When the Army bill was reported back by the conferees for further instructions I voted against the provision raising the standing Army to 250,000 men, and I voted against section 56 of the Chamberlain bill providing for what is best known as the continental-army scheme. Under these circumstances I wish to give my reasons for these votes.

The Senator went ahead and gave his reasons for the vote. Both those measures were intended to place our country in a position to defend itself and, it may be, to assist the Allies in defending the world. The Senator opposed it, and he had a right to oppose it. It was a difference in policy then, just as to-day there is a difference between us as to the proper policy to pursue regarding the Army of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will again do me the justice to say that this so-called continental-army scheme, which was put forward, as I recall, by the Senator from Oregon, among others, was a proposition that was put up in lieu of the National Guard system of the United States, and what the Congress did was to turn down the continental-army scheme which was proposed by the Senator and others and accept the National Guard scheme which I myself and others advocated at that time. That is all there is in that. It was a difference of opinion. I believe now that the National Guard system is incomparably better than the so-called continental system, and the Members of the House and the Senate agreed with me and did not agree with the Senator from Oregon. That is all there is to that. One was for the national defense quite as much as the other. I think the National Guard system and the record of the men who went into the National Guard in this late war have demonstrated that we were exactly right in standing for the National Guard as the primary national defense, because we never had a better national defense than the National Guard.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator can not put me in the category of one who is opposed to the National Guard. The Senator can not talk louder or longer for the National Guard than I. They all vote. We are all their friends. We all talk about them whenever we have a chance to do it. But admitting the strength of the National Guard, their gallantry in action, and the splendid record they made, they became federalized and became a part of the United States Army before they became coordinated and unified so as to do the work that was necessary to be done.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator can take his own time and make his own speech. I desire to finish what I have to say without these constant interruptions. As I said a while ago, the people do not care about any controversies between the Senator and myself.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the Senator keeps referring to me.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator kept referring to me, and I have answered him, and I have the floor. The Senator can get after my scalp or take my scalp when I get through.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have never referred to the Senator at all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; the Senator does not have to refer to me when he charges men as a body with indulging in subterfuge here on the floor of the Senate and endeavoring to accomplish by indirection something they are not undertaking to accomplish at all. They are undertaking to accomplish something for the good of the country. Let us try to find out the facts about it and then vote.

I am frank to say that I expect universal compulsory military training to be defeated. I have not any question about that. All legislation is the result of compromise. If a Senator or a body of Senators can not get all they want, there is no reason why they should not get a part of what they want if there is a chance to compromise. That is all that the proposed amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is. It is to undertake to save something from this wreck, something that the President of the United States wanted to save if possible.

Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee, in that speech of May 13, 1916, said—and I hope the Senator will listen to this, because he may have forgotten it:

> I have not the slightest idea of our becoming involved in war with any European country.

That was on the 13th day of May, 1916. That was when the national-defense act was up for consideration. That was less than a year before the Senate and the House declared the war. He said:

> The Regular Army officers, who it is claimed are behind the Chamberlain bill, as I noticed from the debate in the Senate, printed in the RECORD, naturally do not want the National Guard used in our system because it does not, in the first place, mean rapid promotion for them, and, in the second place, they naturally want to build up as large a standing army as possible. Of course, I do not blame them. They are to be commended for wanting to make the Army effective. I feel quite sure that the continental army can not be recruited, and if not recruited then it is hoped to come back before another Congress and have some sort of compulsory military service bill passed. Of course, I am opposed to universal compulsory military service, and I am opposed to a large standing army in times of peace. I do not blame these Army officers. It is natural that they should want to make larger the Regular Establishment. But the duty of Congress is to consider only the best interests of the country.

I have not the slightest idea of our becoming involved in war with any European country. I have absolute confidence in the President and his ability to keep us out of this European war, and keep us out with honor. Certainly, I see no reason why we should go to war. We can not go to war without Congress declaring it, and I do not know of a man in Congress who would be willing to vote for a resolution declaring war on any European country. We have the greatest prosperity in this country, taken as a whole, and it would be silly and ridiculous for us to disturb it by getting into this European imbroglio. If we were to build up a great standing army like that provided for in the Chamberlain bill, an excitable President could get us into war without declaring it. Of course, President Wilson would not do this, but some other President more easily excited might do so.

Think of it, Mr. President, less than a year before the time when America, on the recommendation of the President of the United States, declared war against Germany.

Mr. President, I honestly believe that if the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] had bent his efforts toward creating a large citizen soldiery or a large standing army at that time, in view of the troubled condition of the country, we would not have had any war with Germany; but the Senator opposed a large army, he opposed then universal military training, he opposed anything that squinted toward what he and others called a militaristic system in this country, and it was because of that fact, because Senators stood on the floor of the Senate of the United States and gentlemen stood on the floor of the House of Representatives and opposed everything looking toward the preparation of America to fight. If we all had gotten together and put our shoulders to the wheel and said, "We will not only organize a large Army, if need be, but we stand ready to train every young man in this country in the science of war, and we will do it at a moment's warning"—if we had done that, instead of declaiming against the so-called fear of cultivating a militaristic spirit, we would not have had any war.

I sometimes think this appeal against the so-called militaristic spirit has tended to enervate the young men of the country, that it has tended to destroy national pride and patriotism, and nothing but this war, which brought the sons of the rich and poor alike together and made them confer with each other and realize the situation, ever aroused in them a spirit of love of country that was going to sleep.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, as reenforcing what the Senator said as to the probability that we would not have been compelled to enter the war if we had had a sufficient military force, and a sufficient and effective system of military training in this country, I want to remind him that it has been repeatedly stated in the papers of the country that one of the great surprises to the Emperor and the German military authorities was that America had been able to provide for conscription after war was declared. They had no idea that the country would stand for it. If they had known in advance that that would be done, they never would have provoked us into the war.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think there is no doubt of that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] differs from the President about the troubled condition of the world now. He does not think there is anything that exists to-day that necessitates the training of the young men. The President seems to think that the troubled condition of the world requires some sort of training of the young men of the country.

The Senator from Tennessee may be mistaken now, just as he was mistaken in 1916. He said that the President would not get us into the war; that he would keep us out of the war; that there was nothing to fight about. But the President advised us to get in, and the Senator helped get us in. Now, the President says there is a troubled condition that necessitates training the young men. The Senator from Tennessee says there is no need of it; that there is no use to train them now. Who is right? I think the President is right.

I think it is just as well to be prepared, Mr. President, and let the world know that America, for the present, at least, while the troubled world situation exists, is going to be ready to fight if it needs to fight. Everybody knows that nobody hates war any more than I do, and nobody would go further to keep out of it than I will. But America owes a duty to itself and to the world to maintain her dignity as a separate nationality, and as the greatest Republic in the world, the greatest country in the world.

Mr. President, it has been charged by the Senator from Tennessee, and charged by others, that this system of training of the young men is violative of the traditions of this country. May I call attention to the fact that the first act which was passed by the Congress of the United States, in 1792, recommended by Gen. Washington and prepared by Gen. Knox, was a military-training act. It provided that all men of certain ages, between 18 and 65, I think, should assemble at certain seasons of the year, at least once a year, and train in the use of arms. It became obsolescent in later years, but was not finally repealed until the Dick law was passed in 1903. So that we have had it all the time; and I beg to call the Senator's attention to the Knox report on that act, and if he believes that this is violative of the traditions of America, ask him to read that report, which was approved by Gen. Washington, and the bill was practically enacted as recommended.

In order not to take too much time, I am going to ask that there may be inserted in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, letters and opinions written by Gen. Washington and other leaders, from his time down to the present time, advocating the draft.

The man who, above all others, was in a position to speak intelligently as well as feelingly upon the subject of the militia during the Revolution was Gen. Washington. He did not hesitate to speak out on more than one occasion as to the inefficiency of the volunteer system.

On February 9 ,1776, he wrote:

To expect the same service from raw and undisciplined recruits as from veteran soldiers is to expect what never did and perhaps never will happen.

On August 20, 1780:

Had we formed a permanent army in the beginning, * * * we never should have had to retreat with a handful of men across the Delaware in 1776, trembling for the fate of America; * * * we should not have been the greatest part of the war inferior to the enemy, indebted for our safety to their inactivity, enduring frequently the mortification of seeing inviting opportunities to ruin them pass unimproved for want of a force which the country was completely able to afford, and of seeing the country ravaged, our towns burnt, the inhabitants plundered, abused, murdered with impunity, from the same cause.

September 15, 1780:

Regular troops are alone equal to the exigencies of modern war, as well for defense as offense, and whenever a substitute is attempted it must prove illusory and ruinous.

And, again, on September 24, 1776, in a letter to the President of the Continental Congress, he said, amongst other things:

To place any dependence upon militia is assuredly resting upon a broken staff. Men just dragged from the tender scenes of domestic life, unaccustomed to the din of arms, totally unacquainted with every kind of military skill (which is followed by want of confidence in themselves when opposed to troops regularly trained, disciplined and appointed, superior in knowledge and superior in arms), are timid and ready to fly from their own shadows. Besides, the sudden change in their manner of living, particularly in their lodging, brings on sickness in many, impatience in all, and such an unconquerable desire of returning to their respective homes that it not only produces shameful and scandalous desertions among themselves, but infuses the like spirit in others. Again, men accustomed to unbounded freedom and no control can not brook the restraint which is indispensably necessary to the good order and government of the army, without which licentiousness and every kind of disorder triumphantly reigns. To bring men to a proper degree of subordination is not the work of a day, a month, or even a year; and unhappily for us and the cause we are engaged in, the little discipline I have been laboring to establish in the army under my immediate command is in a manner done away by having such a mixture of troops as have been called together within these few months.

Again, in the same letter, he says:

The jealousy of a standing army and the evils to be apprehended from one are remote, and, in my judgment, situated and circumstanced as we are, not at all to be dreaded; but the consequence of wanting one, according to my ideas formed from the present view of things, is certain and inevitable ruin. For if I was called upon to declare upon oath whether the militia have been most serviceable or hurtful upon the whole, I should subscribe to the latter. I do not mean by this, however, to arraign the conduct of Congress; in so doing I should equally condemn my own measures if I did not my judgment; but experience, which is the best criterion to work by, so fully, clearly, decisively, reprobates the practice of trusting to militia that no man who regards order, regularity, and economy, or who has any regard for his own honor, character, or peace of mind will risk them upon this issue.

And, again, in a letter to the President of the Congress, under date of December 5, 1776, he said:

When I reflect on the losses we have sustained for want of good troops, the certainty of this is placed beyond a doubt in my mind. In such a case the militia, who have been harassed and tired by repeated calls upon them, and farming and manufactures in a manner suspended, would, upon any pressing emergency, have run with alacrity to arms, whereas the cry now is, 'They may be as well ruined in one way as another,' and with difficulty they are obtained. I mention these things to show that, in my opinion, if any dependence is placed in the militia another year Congress will be deceived. When danger is a little removed from them they will not turn out at all. When it comes home to them the well affected, instead of flying to arms to defend themselves, are busily employed in removing their families and effects, while the disaffected are concerting measures to make their submission and spread terror and dismay all around to induce others to follow their example. Daily experience and abundant proofs warrant this information.

And in a letter to the same person under date of December 20, 1776, he said:

It is needless to add that short enlistments and a mistaken dependence upon militia have been the origin of all our misfortunes and the great accumulation of our debt. We find, sir, that the enemy are daily gathering strength from the disaffected. This strength, like a snowball by rolling, will increase unless some means can be devised to check effectually the progress of the enemy's arms. Militia may possibly do for it for a little while, but in a little while also the militia of those States which have been frequently called upon will not turn out at all;

or if they do, it will be with so much reluctance and sloth as to amount to the same thing. Instance, New Jersey. Witness, Pennsylvania. Could anything but the river Delaware have saved Philadelphia?

On the 17th of October, 1777, he wrote to President Thomas Wharton, of Pennsylvania, as follows:

There is another matter which I beg leave to recommend to the serious consideration of the legislature of your State; that is, the adopting of some mode of completing and keeping up the quota of your continental regiments. Upon an average, your battalions have never been above one-third full, and now many of them are far below even that. From the extravagant prices given to substitutes in the militia in the different States, it has become impossible to recruit more upon the bounty allowed by Congress. The New England States and Virginia have begun to adopt the mode of drafting and, I am informed, they have succeeded very well. I am convinced that this will be found the only method of raising continental troops, and if the measure were to become general throughout the States it would not be deemed a hardship. I mention this matter to you at this time in the hope that you will as soon as possible fall upon this or some other mode to recruit your regiments in the course of this fall and winter, and as it is more than probable that our opposition will not end with this campaign, we ought to endeavor to have a respectable army in the field in the spring, before the enemy can receive further reenforcements from Europe.

On the 18th of November, 1779, he wrote from West Point to the President of Congress as follows:

In the more early stages of the contest, when men might have enlisted for the war, no man, as my whole conduct and the uniform tenor of my letters will evince, was ever more opposed to short enlistments than I was, and while there remained a prospect of obtaining recruits upon a permanent footing in the first instance, as far as duty and a regard to my station would permit, I urged my sentiments in favor of it. But the prospect of keeping up an army by voluntary enlistments being changed, or at least standing on too precarious and uncertain a footing to depend on for the exigency of our affairs, I took the liberty in February, 1778, in a particular manner to lay before the Committee of Arrangements, then with the army at Valley Forge, a plan for an annual draft as the surest and most certain, if not the only means left us, of maintaining the army on a proper and respectable ground. And, more and more confirmed in propriety of this opinion by the intervention of a variety of circumstances unnecessary to detail, I again took the freedom of urging the plan to the committee of conference in January last; and, having reviewed it in every point of light and found it right, or at least the best that has occurred to me, I hope I shall be excused by Congress for offering it to them, and in time for carrying it into execution for the next year, if they should conceive it necessary for the States to complete their quotas of troops.

The plan I would propose is that each State be informed by Congress annually of the real deficiency of its troops, and called upon to make up, or such less specific number as Congress may think proper, by a draft; that the men drafted join the army by the 1st of January and serve until the 1st of January in the succeeding year; that from the time the drafts join the army the officers of the States from which they come be authorized and directed to use their endeavors to enlist them for the war, under the bounties to the officers themselves and the recruits granted by the act of the 23d of January last, namely, $10 to the officers for each recruit, and $200 to the recruits themselves; that all State, county, and town bounties to drafts, if practicable, be entirely abolished, on account of the uneasiness and disorders they create among the soldiers, the desertions they produce, and for other reasons which will readily occur; that on or before the 1st of October annually an abstract or return similar to the present one be transmitted to Congress, to enable them to make their requisitions to each State with certainty and precision.

On the 25th of May, 1780, he wrote to Phillip Schuyler, John Mathews, and Nathaniel Peabody, a committee of Congress:

Unless the principal part of the force be composed of men regularly organized, and on the continuance of whose services we can rely, nothing decisive can be attempted. The militia are too precarious a dependence to justify such an attempt, where they form a material part of the plan. Militia can not have the necessary habits nor the consistency either for an assault or a siege. In employing them essentially we should run a risk of being abandoned in the most critical moments. The expense and the consumption of provisions and stores, which we are bound by every motive to economize, will be very considerably increased. As we should not be able to keep the same body in the field during the whole campaign, we should a great part of the time have a double set of men to pay and feed, those in actual service and those on the march to relieve them or returning home when relieved. The operations of husbandry will suffer in proportion.

The mode of draft is, I am persuaded, the only efficacious one to obtain men. It appears to me certain that it is the only one to obtain them in time; nor can the period which you have appointed for bringing them into the field be delayed without defeating the object. I have little doubt that at any time, and much less at the present juncture, the powers of the Government exerted with confidence will be equal to the purpose of drafting. The hopes of the people, elevated by the prospects before them, will induce a cheerful compliance with this and all the other measures of vigor which have been recommended and which the exigency requires.

On March 12, 1782, he wrote James McHenry as follows:

It is idle at this late period of the war, when enthusiasm is cooled, if not done away, when the minds of that class of men who are proper subjects for soldiers are poisoned by the high bounties which have been given and the knowledge of the distresses of the Army so generally diffused through every State, to suppose that our battalions can be completed by voluntary enlistment. The attempt is vain, and we are only deceiving ourselves and injuring the cause by making the experiment. There is no other effectual method to get men suddenly but that of classing the people and compelling each class to furnish a recruit.

AUTHORITY OF JEFFERSON.

Jefferson ought to be pretty good authority with a southern audience, and I recall his views on the subject. He did not think the draft was violative of our traditional policy, un-American, or unnecessary.

In a letter to Secretary of War Dearborn September 21, 1805, inclosing a proposed law for compulsory military service for the Army and Navy, he said:

Considering that the important thing is to keep the militia classes so that we may get at the young for a year's service at a time, and that training may be supplied after they are called out, I think we may give up every part of the bill which respects training and arming. Let us once get possession of the principle, and future Congresses will train and arm. In this way we get rid of all those enemies to the bill to whom different details would be objectionable. I send to you the bill thus modified, and I have thrown in a few words in the clause beginning with the words: "The junior class shall be liable," etc., in order that the law may execute itself without waiting for any legislature. Will you be so good as to communicate it to Gen. Varnum and Mr. Bidwell? The sooner the better.

In his annual message to Congress December 3, 1805, he said:

In the meantime, you will consider whether it would not be expedient for a state of peace as well as of war so to organize or class the militia as would enable us on any sudden emergency to call for the services of the younger portions, unencumbered with the old and those having families. Upward of 300,000 able-bodied men between the ages of 18 and 26 years, which the last census shows we may now count within our limits, will furnish a competent number for offense or defense in any point where they may be wanted, and will give time for raising regular forces after the necessity of them shall become certain; and the reducing to the early period of life all its active service can not but be desirable to our younger citizens of the present as well as future times, inasmuch as it engages to them in more advanced age a quiet and undisturbed repose in the bosom of their families. I can not then but earnestly recommend to your early consideration the expediency of so modifying our militia system, as by a separation of the more active part from that which is less so we may draw from it when necessary an efficient corps fit for real and active service, and to be called to it in regular rotation.

JEFFERSON URGED DRAFT.

On the 26th of February, 1810, explaining this part of his message, he wrote Gen. Kosciusko as follows:

Two measures have not been adopted which I pressed on Congress repeatedly at their meetings. The one to settle the whole ungranted territory of Orleans by donations of land to able-bodied young men, to be engaged and carried there at the public expense, who would constitute a force always ready on the spot to defend New Orleans. The other was to class the militia according to the years of their birth, and make all those from 20 to 25 liable to be trained and called into service at a moment's warning. This would have given us a force of 300,000 young men, prepared by proper training, for service in any part of the United States, while those who had passed through that period would remain at home, liable to be used in their own or adjacent States. These two measures would have completed what I deemed necessary for the entire security of our country. They would have given me, on my retirement from the Government of the Nation, the consolatory reflection that, having found, when I was called to it, not a single seaport town in a condition to repel a levy of contribution by a single privateer or pirate, I had left every harbor so prepared by works and gunboats as to be in a reasonable state of security against any probable attack; the territory of Orleans acquired and planted with an internal force sufficient for its protection; and the whole territory of the United States organized by such a classification of its male force as would give it the benefit of all its young population for active service, and that of middle and advanced age for stationary defense. But these measures will, I hope, be completed by my successors, who, to the purest principles of republican patriotism, adds a wisdom and foresight second to no man on earth.

JUSTICE MARSHALL'S OPINION.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the early case of McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316), laid down a canon of constitutional construction which has been followed by every distinguished judge since. In express terms he spoke of the solemnity of the duty he was performing in rendering the decision and with masterly ability he covered the whole subject from every angle. He said:

But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adopted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

Following the logic of that decision, Congress having the power to declare war, to raise and support armies, provide and maintain a Navy, and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution these powers and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof, wherein is there lacking the slightest element of constitutional power to do any and every thing essential to the preservation of our country's civilization and the liberties of our people?

In the first legal-tender case of Hepburn v. Griswold (8 Wall., 603) the court, although nullifying as unconstitutional an act of Congress, affirmed the principles laid down by Chief Justice Marshall, as they did in both the majority and minority opinions in the second legal-tender case of Knox v. Lee (12 Wall., 457), sustaining the same act of Congress, the court saying:

Even in Hepburn v. Griswold both the majority and minority of the court concurred in accepting the doctrines of McCulloch v. Maryland as sound expositions of the Constitution, though disagreeing in their application. With these rules of constitutional construction before us, settled at an early period in the history of the Government, hitherto universally accepted, and not even doubted, we have a safe guide to a right decision of the questions before us.

In Juillard v. Greenman (110 U. S., 421) the court said:

A constitution establishing a frame of government, declaring fundamental principles and creating a national sovereignty, and intended to endure for ages and to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs, is not to be interpreted with the strictness of a private contract.

And, again:

Congress must possess the choice of means and must be empowered to use any means which are in fact conducive to the exercise of a power granted by the Constitution.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON'S VIEWS.

The authorities essential to the common defense are these: To raise armies; to build and equip fleets; to prescribe rules for the government of both; to direct their operations; to provide for their support. These powers ought to exist without limitation, because it is impossible to foresee or define the extent and variety of national exigencies or the correspondent extent and variety of the means which may be necessary to satisfy them. The circumstances that endanger the safety of nations are infinite, and for this reason no constitutional shackles can wisely be imposed on the power to which the care of it is committed. This power ought to be coextensive with all the possible combinations of such circumstances, and ought to be under the direction of the same councils which are appointed to preside over the common defense.

This is one of those truths which, to a correct and unprejudiced mind, carries its own evidence along with it, and may be obscured but can not be made plainer by argument or reasoning. It rests upon axioms as simple as they are universal; the means ought to be proportioned to the end; the persons from whose agency the attainment of any end is expected ought to possess the means by which it is to be attained.

Whether there ought to be a Federal Government intrusted with the care of the common defense is a question in the first instance open for discussion; but the moment it is decided in the affirmative it will follow that that Government ought to be clothed with all the powers requisite to complete execution of its trust, and unless it can be shown that the circumstances which may affect the public safety are reducible within certain determinate limits, unless the contrary of this position can be fairly and rationally disputed, it must be admitted as a necessary consequence that there can be no limitation of that authority which is to provide for the defense and protection of the community in any matter essential to its efficacy; that is, in any matter essential to the formation, direction, or support of the national forces. (The Federalist, No. 23, pp. 152, 153, edition of Central Law Journal Co., 1914.)

JAMES MADISON'S VIEWS.

Madison, discussing the same subject, said:

Is the power of declaring war necessary? No man will answer this question in the negative. It would be superfluous therefore to enter into a proof of the affirmative. The existing Confederation establishes this power in the most ample form.

Is the power of raising armies and equipping fleets necessary? This is involved in the foregoing power. It is involved in the power of self-defense.

But was it necessary to give an indefinite power of raising troops, as well as providing fleets, and of maintaining both in peace as well as in war?

The answer to these questions has been too far anticipated in another place to admit an extensive discussion of them in this place. The answer, indeed, seems to be so obvious and conclusive as scarcely to justify such a discussion in any place. With what color of propriety could the force necessary for defense be limited by those who can not limit the force of offense? If a Federal Constitution could chain the ambition or set bounds to the exertions of all other nations, then, indeed, it might prudently chain the discretion of its own Government and set bounds to the exertions for its own safety.

How could a readiness for war in time of peace be safely prohibited, unless we could prohibit, in like manner, the preparations and establishments of every hostile nation? The means of security can only be regulated by the means and the danger of attack. They will, in fact, be ever determined by these rules, and by no others. It is in vain to oppose constitutional barriers to the impulse of self-preservation. (The Federalist, No. 41, pp. 275, 276, edition of Central Law Journal Co., 1914.)

The Senator from Tennessee will say that that was in time of war. That is true. But the same arguments that were made against Washington's demands in war times were made against the selective-service law when we were precipitated into the World War. The arguments were just the same. I am citing it for the purpose of showing that this course is not violative of the traditions of our country, but is in line with the traditions of our country from Washington down to the present.

I do not know that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] indulged in any criticism of the Father of his Country, or whether he made any statements on the floor of the Senate that if we undertook to enforce the selective-service act there would be riot and bloodshed all over the country. Some Senators said that if they undertook to enforce it there would be riot and bloodshed. The cases in opposition to the draft were sporadic. It was perfectly remarkable the way the people supported and the young men of this country came under the terms of the selective-service law, and, as a rule, wherever there was opposition to the draft it happened to be in States the Senators or Representatives from which opposed the draft on the floor of Congress. I think that is generally true. But the American youth realized, when this act became a law, that they did owe a duty to their country, and there was not any disposition to make a protest against or to raise a riot about it. They came under its terms with magnificent gallantry and patriotism.

There was riot and bloodshed, however, at the time the draft act of the Civil War was undertaken to be put in force. The reasons for it were very different from those which existed at the time the selective-service act was passed. President Lincoln had a hard time quieting those riots, particularly in New York, where there were some persons killed and an immense amount of property destroyed. President Lincoln wrote a magnificent paper in support of the draft at that time, a part of which I am going to ask to have printed in the RECORD. It was written in his own handwriting, as is stated by Messrs. Nicolay and Hay in their Life of Lincoln, and they inserted it in that work. There was never an abler paper written in favor of the draft than that article by President Lincoln, and I ask to have part of it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"It is at all times proper that misunderstanding between the public and the public servant should be avoided, and this is far more important now than in times of peace and tranquillity. I therefore address you without searching for a precedent upon which to do so. Some of you are sincerely devoted to the republican institutions and territorial integrity of our country and yet are opposed to what is called the draft or conscription.

"At the beginning of the war, and ever since, a variety of motives, pressing some in one direction and some in the other, would be presented to the mind of each man physically fit for a soldier, upon the combined effect of which motives he would or would not voluntarily enter the service. Among these motives would be patriotism, political bias, ambition, personal courage, love of adventure, want of employment, and convenience, or the opposite of some of these. We already have and have had in the service, as appears, substantially all that can be obtained upon this voluntary weighing of motives. And yet we must somehow obtain more or relinquish the original object of the contest, together with all the blood and treasure already expended in the effort to secure it. To meet this necessity the law for the draft has been enacted. You who do not wish to be soldiers do not like this law. This is natural; nor does it imply want of patriotism. Nothing can be so just and necessary as to make us like it if it is disagreeable to us. We are prone, too, to find false arguments with which to excuse ourselves for opposing such disagreeable things. In this case those who desire the rebellion to succeed and others who seek reward in a different way are very active in accommodating us with this class of arguments. * * *

"The republican institutions and territorial integrity of our country can not be maintained without the further raising and supporting of armies. There can be no army without men. Men can be had only voluntarily or involuntarily. We have ceased to obtain them voluntarily, and to obtain them involuntarily is the draft—the conscription. If you dispute the fact and declare that men can still be had voluntarily in sufficient number, prove the assertion by yourselves volunteering in such numbers, and I shall gladly give up the draft. Or if not a sufficient number, but any one of you will volunteer, he for his single self will escape all the horrors of the draft and will thereby do only what each one of at least a million of his manly brethren have already done. Their toil and blood have been given as much for you as for themselves. Shall it all be lost rather than that you, too, will bear your part?

"I do not say that all who would avoid serving in the war are unpatriotic; but I do think every patriot should willingly take his chance under a law made with great care in order to secure entire fairness. This law was considered, discussed, modified, and amended by Congress at great length and with much labor, and was finally passed by both branches with a near approach to unanimity. At last it may not be exactly such as any one man out of Congress, or even in Congress, would have made it. It has been said, and I believe truly, that the Constitution itself is not altogether such as any one of its framers would have preferred. It was the joint work of all, and certainly the better that it was so.

"The principle of the draft, which simply is involuntary or enforced service, is not new. It has been practiced in all ages of the world. It was well known to the framers of our Constitution as one of the modes of raising armies at the time they placed in that instrument the provision that 'the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies.' It had been used just before, in establishing our independence, and it was also used under the Constitution in 1812. Wherein is the peculiar hardship now? Shall we shrink from the necessary means to maintain our free government, which our grandfathers employed to establish it and our own fathers have already employed once to maintain it? Are we degenerate? Has the manhood of our race run out?

"Again, a law may be both constitutional and expedient, and yet may be administered in an unjust and unfair way. This law belongs to a class, which class is composed of those laws whose object is to distribute burthens or benefits on the principle of equality. No one of these laws can ever be practically administered with that exactness which can be conceived of in the mind. A tax law, the principle of which is that each owner shall pay in proportion to the value of his property, will be a dead letter if no one can be compelled to pay until it can be shown that every other one will pay in precisely the same proportion, according to value; nay, even it will be a dead letter if no one can be compelled to pay until it is certain that every other one will pay at all—even in unequal proportion. Again, the United States House of Representatives is constituted on the principle that each Member is sent by the same number of people that each other one is sent by; and yet, in practice, no two of the whole number, much less the whole number, are ever sent by precisely the same number of constituents. The districts can not be made precisely equal in population at first, and if they could they would become unequal in a single day, and much more so in the 10 years which the districts, once made, are to continue. They can not be remodeled every day; nor, without too much expense and labor, even every year.

"This sort of difficulty applies in full force to the practical administration of the draft law; in fact, the difficulty is greater in the case of the draft law. First, it starts with all the inequality of the congressional districts; but these are based on entire population, while the draft is based upon those only who are fit for soldiers, and such may not bear the same proportion to the whole in one district that they do in another. Again, the facts must be ascertained, and credit given, for the unequal numbers of soldiers which have already gone from the several districts. In all these points errors will occur in spite of the utmost fidelity. The Government is bound to administer the law with such an approach to exactness as is usual in analogous cases, and as entire good faith and fidelity will reach. If so great departures as to be inconsistent with such good faith and fidelity, or great departures occurring in any way, be pointed out, they shall be corrected, and any agent shown to have caused such departures intentionally shall be dismissed.

"With these views, and on these principles, I feel bound to tell you it is my purpose to see the draft law faithfully executed."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not believe anyone can charge that the martyred President, that great tribune of the people, was a militarist, or that because he advocated the draft he favored Prussianizing America. I call attention to what he said about the draft to show that in his day and generation it was not considered as violative of our traditions to favor compulsory service.

Mr. President, I do not like to take up any more of the time of the Senate, but when this question of the training of the young men was up before the Military Affairs Committee there were a number of representatives of the American Legion before us, and amongst others there were Col. Hough and Col. Donovan, both officers from civil life, who served with peculiar gallantry in France. I am just going to ask to have inserted in the RECORD a part of what they said about the condition of the young men who went into the service insufficiently trained. God alone knows, Mr. President, how many young lives were sacrificed in this war because when they went over there they not only did not know how to shoot but did not know how to load a gun.

God alone knows how much money was spent because the young men over there not only went over untrained but went over unequipped to fight.

Col. Hough stated, in part:

When I am asked whether I am in favor of compulsory military training my answer to that is to cite what absolutely took place within my experience. When we went into the Argonne—and this is only one instance of many that might be cited—we received a number of replacements. My regiment was distributed in its formation with a battalion in front and a supporting battalion here and a battalion in the rear. Those replacements were assigned to my regiment in bulk, perhaps 300 of them. Under war conditions there was nothing I could do except to parcel them out to the various companies of the regiment. In doing so naturally a certain percentage of the replacements went into the front line. The companies that were in the front line took their quota of replacements and they went immediately into the front line. It was not until after that had been done that I learned that those men had not been in the United States uniform to exceed three weeks in the United States. They had been sent as casuals across the ocean attached to a replacement division and parceled out to combatant troops, and there they were, three weeks in a uniform, and not able even to load their own rifles. It was actually true that the corporals of the various squads in the front line had not only to teach the men how to shoot, but how to force a cartridge into the chambers of their rifles and fire a shot. That is the best instance I know of of an argument for some military preparation to protect our own United States.

Col. Donovan stated, in part:

I would like to say a word on the general question of military training. We have heard expressed frequently the advantage this would be so far as general Americanization is concerned. I think most of us may be agreed upon that, but eventually the purpose of such a bill as this is battle-field efficiency. Now, in getting that there are two things we must consider. The first is that if we are going to call men to go and fight for us it is our obligation as citizens to see that they have a fighting chance for their lives, and the men in this war did not have that chance, and in reading the report of the commander in chief it seems to me that on that point enough credit is not given our allies, the French, their officers and noncommissioned officers, in the training and inspiration they gave to us who commanded combat units there, because those men gave to our men in general instruction a fighting chance for their lives that our own country had denied them.

In substantiation of what Col. Hough has told you, I would like to cite a concrete example of the untrained condition of the men that came in. It was after the Battle of Corpoil. I think we left 50 per cent of the combat battalion there. After that fight I happened to be made a lieutenant colonel. I commanded a battalion there. They were sent to us as replacements, and I personally questioned each replacement sent to us. Ninety per cent of those men were untrained. Ninety per cent of those men had never opened the bolt of their rifles, they had never had on a gas mask. We were told we were going up into the St. Mihiel fight. I got these men before us and I said, "Men, here is what we are going to do; now, I want to give you a chance for your lives. You men who are old men, it will do you no good if you have men by the side of you who are untrained. So I am going to ask you to do this." We marched at night for the battle line. We started at 9 o'clock and would march until 5 o'clock in the morning, and then I would let those men sleep until noon, and then I started in training them, and except when they stopped to eat, we trained them until 9 o'clock at night, when we again started on the march. What does that mean? Let us take you men here, who are intelligent men. Say I am your sergeant in that fight. We are told to go out and take a machine-gun nest. Think what you would do. The first idea would be the idea of fear, that comes to every one of us, there is no use denying it. The next thought would be the gregarious instinct, men will huddle together like sheep, making the surest target for a machine gun. Now, if you were to put on uniforms, do you think that would change your character any?

That was the situation in this war. Those who saw the untrained men going up against machine guns realized the importance of training men beforehand. I think this bill will constitute a laboratory in which men will be trained who will be officers, who will be efficient and humanized. I think the fundamental defect of the A. E. F. was a lack of appreciation of the psychology of command and the art of leadership. What can you expect from men who have had no experience with a citizen soldier, no experience in leadership? What can you expect in the handling of men? Every officer who is worth his salt knows that the only reason for his existence is to look out for his men. But he does not get that by instruction. What we needed was not so much the discipline fire but the discipline of the heart. The American soldier would go any place if he were led, but he had to be led, and that is the kind of spirit we have in this country, and that is what must be done, and if you send your officers where they have contact with enlisted men, where they know the reaction of the citizen, he is going to make a darn sight better officer when it comes to a fight.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In that connection, I would like to cite a statement which has been furnished me from an authority on this subject, a well-informed military officer—and if the Senator has any information on the subject I will be glad to have his comments on it—in which he treats of certain controversies that occurred in the War Department just prior to the war and during the war in regard to the training of soldiers, and cites some reprimand which he states was given to Gen. Crowder because Gen. Crowder insisted upon pushing the training of the men; and in that connection he makes this statement, that the authorities of the Army sent the Three hundred and seventh Infantry and the Three hundred and eighth Infantry into battle with 2,100 men who had never fired a rifle. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it is not a statement that they were merely sent to France without ever having fired a rifle, but they were sent into battle without ever having fired a rifle, and that they had never mastered the Infantry drill. These men, he said, were slaughtered like rats in a trap.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is testimony to corroborate that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. He specifies the regiment. It ought to be very easy to demonstrate if that statement is not true, because there is a record of the Three hundred and seventh and the Three hundred and eighth Regiments, and it can be easily ascertained if the statement is not correct.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know of any testimony with respect to those particular regiments, but there is testimony to sustain that general charge, and that is what I asked to have printed in the RECORD a while ago. Here is what Col. Hough says in a portion of his testimony. Col. Hough was a member of the One hundred and sixty-sixth Infantry, the Rainbow Division, which, as the Senator knows, was a very distinguished fighting organization. He says:

When I am asked whether I am in favor of compulsory military training my answer to that is to cite what absolutely took place within my experience.

I call the Senator's attention to that.

When we went into the Argonne—and this is only one instance of many that might be cited—we received a number of replacements.

That is, the troops who were called in to take the place of the young men who had been killed or else who had been withdrawn from the battle front because they were worn out.

My regiment was distributed in its formation with a battalion in front, and a supporting battalion here, and a battalion in the rear. Those replacements were assigned to my regiment in bulk, perhaps 300 of them. Under war conditions there was nothing I could do except to parcel them out to the various companies of the regiment. In doing so naturally a certain percentage of the replacements went into the front line. The companies that were in the front line took their quota of replacements and they went immediately into the front line. It was not until after that had been done that I learned that those men had not been in the United States uniform to exceed three weeks in the United States. They had been sent as casuals across the ocean attached to a replacement division and parceled out to combatant troops, and there they were, three weeks in a uniform, and not able even to load their own rifles. It was actually true that the corporals of the various squads in the front line had not only to teach the men how to shoot but how to force a cartridge into the chambers of their rifles and fire a shot.

That corroborates the statement which has come to the Senator. There is not any doubt about that. I venture to say that if the Senator would go into his own beautiful city of Spokane and into the high school, where there are boys from 18 to 21 years of age, select promiscuously a group of those young men, and take them out into the woods, they would not know how to load a gun; and yet young soldiers, according to Col. Hough, were put into the battle front who not only did not know how to shoot a gun but did not know how to put a cartridge into a gun. That was criminal, and Congress is measurably responsible for failing to provide in time of peace for training these young men.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator pardon me for just a moment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Some time ago I received a letter from an expert rifleman in my section of the country complaining about the sights on the Army rifles at that time; he said they were impracticable, and that no man could shoot in a hurry and could use the sights at all; that the rear sight was too far from the eye, and the hole in the rear sight was too small. I submitted the matter to the Ordnance Service of the department; of course, they defended the Army rifle, but this is the interesting part of the correspondence: Much to my surprise the authorities of the War Department claimed at that time that they did not expect men in battle to shoot accurately, and they argued that it was not necessary to have a practicable sight on the guns. This was about four or five years ago. I may add—and it is quite interesting—that although they ridiculed the recommendation of this practical rifleman, through accident and through their own inefficiency, not having the proper kind of rifle, and being compelled to accept in part the rifle that was used in the British Army, finally in this war they adopted a rifle with the same sight that this practical rifleman had recommended.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to have had the Senator from Washington add that. We went into the question a long while ago of the manufacture of guns, munitions, and ordnance, and I am not going to refer to it in what I have to say now. I simply call attention to the report of Gen. Pershing, which has just been printed, and which I think Senators can get in the document room. For the verification of all the statements that were made by the Military Affairs Committee early in 1918, that is all the testimony I care for.

Mr. President, there is nothing that will excuse the negligence of a country that fails to teach its young men their duty in time of war. This can be done here without cultivating a militaristic spirit. The only country in Europe that was not directly or indirectly seriously involved in the recent war was Switzerland, and Switzerland has had universal training for years in a more stringent form than we propose it here. The fact that Switzerland can in 24 hours literally call nearly a million men to the colors makes other nations hesitate very much before they will undertake to arouse that little Republic.

It is for the reason that I believe that America ought to train its young men in the use of the implements of war that I have always stood for universal military training, in order that when war does come, if it ever comes, we may call an army together without very much trouble.

I might discuss the effect of the calling together of young men from every section of the country and from every occupation in Americanizing and democratizing them. I heard of an instance over in France where a rich New Yorker was acting as chauffeur for a man who had been his chauffeur before the war. His chauffeur had become an officer and the millionaire was still a private, and yet they were discharging their duties faithfully. They had learned to do that under military discipline. There is not anything that brings men closer together and more completely Americanizes them and tends more to make democratic citizens of them than standing shoulder to shoulder in the duties which fall to a soldier's lot.

Mr. President, I am going to call attention to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of "Selective draft-law cases," Two hundred and forty-fifth United States Reports, 366, sustaining the draft act. It knocks down some of the men of straw which some Senators have raised here in opposition to compulsory military training and service. I ask leave to print a portion of that decision in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted,

The matter referred to is as follows:

"As the mind can not conceive an army without the men to compose it, on the face of the Constitution the objection that it does not give power to provide for such men would seem to be too frivolous for further notice. It is said, however, that since under the Constitution as originally framed State citizenship was primary and United States citizenship but derivative and dependent thereon, therefore the power conferred upon Congress to raise armies was only coterminous with United States citizenship and could not be exerted so as to cause that citizenship to lose its dependent character and dominate State citizenship. But the proposition simply denies to Congress the power to raise armies which the Constitution gives. That power by the very terms of the Constitution, being delegated, is supreme. (Art. VI.) In truth the contention simply assails the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution in conferring authority on Congress and in not retaining it as it was under the Confederation in the several States. Further it is said the right to provide is not denied by calling for volunteer enlistments, but it does not and can not include the power to exact enforced military duty by the citizen. This, however, but challenges the existence of all power, for a governmental power which has no sanction to it and which therefore can only be exercised provided the citizen consents to its exertion is in no substantial sense a power. It is argued, however, that although this is abstractly true, it is not concretely so, because as compelled military service is repugnant to a free government and in conflict with all the great guaranties of the Constitution as to individual liberty, it must be assumed that the authority to raise armies was intended to be limited to the right to call an army into existence counting alone upon the willingness of the citizen to do his duty in time of public need; that is, in time of war. But the premise of this proposition is so devoid of foundation that it leaves not even a shadow of ground upon which to base the conclusion. Let us see if this is not at once demonstrable. It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need and the right to compel it. (Vattel, Law of Nations, Book III, chs. 1 and 2.) To do more than state the proposition is absolutely unnecessary in view of the practical illustration afforded by the almost universal legislation to that effect now in force. In England it is certain that before the Norman conquest the duty of the great militant body of the citizens was recognized and enforceable. (Blackstone, Book I, ch. 13.) It is unnecessary to follow the long controversy between Crown and Parliament as to the branch of the Government in which the power resided, since there never was any doubt that it somewhere resided. So also it is wholly unnecessary to explore the situation for the purpose of fixing the sources whence in England it came to be understood that the citizen or the force organized from the militia as such could not without their consent be compelled to render service in a foreign country, since there is no room to contend that such principle ever rested upon any challenge of the right of Parliament to impose compulsory duty upon the citizen to perform military duty wherever the public exigency exacted, whether at home or abroad. This is exemplified by the present English service act."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The court then proceeds to consider the acts of the Colonies, the acts of the States under the Articles of Confederation, and the provisions of the Constitution, and concludes that Congress had power to pass the selective-service law, and the present act for compulsory military training is not obnoxious to that decision.

Mr. President, in conclusion let me say that, if universal compulsory military training is put in force under this bill, ample provision is made for the training of these young men, industrially and otherwise. It will constitute a school for them, so that they will not only be fitted for the duties of citizenship by the discipline through which they will have passed but they will be fitted for the duties of industrial life by having their hands, their eyes, and their brains trained for particular branches of service.

Yesterday in what I had to say I mentioned Camp Holabird, in Baltimore, a camp which I myself have visited, where training is carried on in industrial and vocational pursuits. Young men are volunteering for enlistment in order to learn a trade there. They go there from every walk of life; and, although many of them have only common-school educations, they learn every part of an automobile, and when they leave that camp at the end of a year they can almost build an automobile, and every part of it. They are taught to handle the forge; they are taught to work at the anvil; they are taught to make things from diagrams and blue prints which they have never seen before or known anything about. I went through every department of that institution, and the officer in command assured me that these young men went out of the Army and secured positions in automobile factories throughout the United States at from forty to sixty dollars a week. Letters are coming into the camp asking for the services of the young men whenever they are discharged; and those who have not fitted themselves to do otherwise than act as chauffeurs go out and obtain excellent positions in that capacity.

Mr. President, in answer to the charge that politics is being played by some of us who are willing to compromise compulsory military training for voluntary training, permit me to say that, if we do not intend to compel all young men to learn the things that make for better citizenship in this country, we ought at least to give every young man who wants it a chance to learn, and to learn at the expense of the Government of the United States. My opinion is that the object lesson will be of such splendid advantage to the American people that all of the young men will ask that compulsory training become the vogue in this country. I hope that the Senate may see fit to enact the provisions of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I should like to have considered. Before the amendment is stated, however, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Gerry	Lenroot	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Glass	Lodge	Smoot
Brandegee	Gore	McCormick	Spencer
Calder	Hale	McCumber	Sterling
Capper	Harris	McKellar	Swanson
Chamberlain	Harrison	Norris	Townsend
Colt	Kellogg	Nugent	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Phelan	Wadsworth
Dial	Kenyon	Poindexter	Warren
Dillingham	Keyes	Ransdell
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is not present. The Secretary will call the list of absentees.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. MCNARY answered to their names when called.

Mr. BALL, Mr. ELKINS, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. GAY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 65, line 5, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert "who have been citizens for at least 10 years." In lines 6 and 7, page 65, strike out the following words: "and all male persons who reside therein and who have declared their intention to become citizens." On page 65, line 19, after the word "months," strike out the period and insert: "and all applications to participate in training shall be submitted to the adjutant general of the State in which the applicant is a resident and forwarded to the War Department with the approval of the governor of said State."

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I have endeavored to answer for myself three questions in connection with this subject of universal military training in order to enable me to make up my own mind as to what is the right thing to do in the matter.

I could wish that the title of "universal military training" had never been adopted, for to my mind the military features of the plan are far less important and far less extensive than are the essential educational elements of the plan.

The first question which I asked myself was whether or not the principle of universal training was right and whether its application was desirable.

When we think, as Americans, of the astounding fact that one out of every four of our soldiers in the last war was unable to write a letter home in English or to read an order written in English, and when we remember that there are in the United States five and a half million of people above school age who can not read or write in the English language, and that there are 3,000,000 in the United States who can not speak the English language or understand it when it is spoken, and that one of every three American boys called to the colors was rejected because of physical inability, the result is a strong determination to do anything that will promote the subject of general mental and physical education in the Nation.

So I have answered the first question to my own mind by definitely determining that any plan that has for its main purpose or as a large part of its purpose the education of young American manhood, mentally and physically, is a plan that is right in principle and is desirable to try.

The universal military training as contemplated in this bill provides that the young manhood of the Nation for four months shall, at Government expense, undergo an intensive form of training. The time of the year is optional with the young man. If his occupation is upon the farm, he may take that training at a time of the year when the duties of the farm are not arduous. If he is engaged in industrial life, he may take that four months of training at a time of the year when it is most convenient and imposes upon him the least burden. He has the option of taking it either in his eighteenth or his nineteenth or his twentieth year.

All of that is optional with the individual young man himself; but the great foundation of the plan is that there shall be brought together the young manhood of the Nation, and that when they are thus gathered at Government expense there shall be four months of intensive training—mental, physical, and in the principles for which the American flag stands.

I should like to take that training myself. I should like to have every one of my three boys take that training. It would be Plattsburg magnified. It would bring together the young manhood from every section of the country and from every walk of life, together with all the resulting democratic efficiency and understanding that would result from the men of every geographical section and every kind of occupation coming into close relationship with each other on terms of absolute equality. It would demonstrate upon a larger scale what the public schools are demonstrating every day. The military features of the plan are not absent. The lack of training of a soldier results in the needless sacrifices of war; and, as the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] so ably represented the other day, in case of an emergency—and no man can tell when that emergency may arise—the four months of training might well be not only necessary for the Nation but absolutely necessary for the life of the soldier.

The general principle of universal military training—though I do not like the name; I would much prefer "universal training for American citizenship"; it would be truer in its application, it would arouse less misunderstanding, it would be in every way more desirable—but the principle itself has the merit of right in it and its application is desirable.

The second question I ask of myself is whether the plan itself, namely, four months of intensive training, is the best plan, and upon that I am not so clear. No one can tell what only four months of training will do. It is a problem; it is a venture. It may result in a mere accumulation of training soon to be forgotten, for it is not followed up. No one can tell whether four months are sufficient to really accomplish what the plan proposes. It is an experiment.

My mind leads rather to the advisability of the Swiss plan or to the Australian plan of universal military training. Those plans differ from the plan proposed in the pending bill in that they have no long period of intensive training, but they take the boyhood of Switzerland, commencing at the age of about 12, and in connection with his education they give him substantially the very same training that is intensively concentrated in four months of time under the present proposed plan. When the Swiss boy has had his training in school in his twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth years, then, if I remember rightly, in his sixteenth year he has a certain period of a few weeks when he has the intensive training which under this plan is provided for in a longer time and without any of the preliminary school education.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think, if the Senator will permit me, he will find on examination of the Swiss law that a young man in Switzerland is called out annually for two or three or four years for maneuvers, two or three weeks at a time.

Mr. SPENCER. I think the Senator is quite right.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And he is a member of the citizen reserve army during a considerable period of time; and that is all the army they have. As a matter of fact, their only regular army consists of officers who really do the guiding and teaching and training in the maneuvers. As a result they have a perfectly democratic army, composed of citizen soldiers, liable to service in time of war or to protect the nation; and that little country, with 400,000 men on its borders, maintained its neutrality in the midst of the greatest vortex that ever occurred in Europe.

Mr. SPENCER. I thank the Senator for the interruption. The facts are exactly as he presents them. The difference between the two plans is that in Switzerland the foundation of the plan is through the course of years. The Swiss boys, during the formative period of their lives, are gradually trained in citizenship. It is a part of their required education, and when they reach the age of young manhood, 16 years, if I remember rightly, then they have a period in camp of a few weeks, and the next year for a shorter period, and the third year for a still shorter, and then they go into the reserve, as the Senator from New York has stated, for an extended period, but subject to military duty only in case of national need. This provides the great illustration of a citizen army as the result of universal military training, and the plan is not dissimilar from that followed in Australia.

I am not clear but that such a plan is better than the plan proposed in the pending bill. The difficulty with the Swiss plan in the United States is our great extent of territory, the difficulty of applying it in the thinly settled portions of the United States, and the difficulty of the added cost of transportation, none of which difficulties are present in Switzerland.

So when I come to answer the second question, as to whether the plan proposed by the bill is the best plan, I have not been able to satisfy myself. I do know that the principle of this bill is worth a trial. I do know that the principle for which it stands is right. I do know that it is absolutely essential for the preservation of our country that some such plan as this should be put into operation.

That leads me to the third question, which I ask myself, and that is, What ought to be done at this time in connection with the matter? If the principle is right, by all odds the principle ought to be conserved and not defeated. If it is uncertain whether the proposed plan of carrying out this general principle is the best, then the plan ought to be tried to determine whether it is the best plan or not, and in a trial of it there is no need of making it compulsory. It can be tried by voluntary enlistment as well as it can by universal compulsion. The plan is as capable of demonstration with 50,000 American young men who may voluntarily elect to try it as it is with 500,000 who are compelled to try it, and everyone would probably agree that 50,000 men would volunteer; and the principle could be just as well demonstrated as if the compulsory feature of the bill were included at the start, though such compulsion would undoubtedly produce a larger number of students.

Then there is a question in my mind as to how wise it is to introduce the feature of compulsion, even if the plan is wise in principle, when a great part of the public opinion of the country is adverse to such compulsion. I do not care so much whether that opposition arises from a mistaken impression or whether it arises from an intelligent conviction upon the actual merits of the case. The point is that in a nation ruled by public opinion there must be a certain amount of deference to the opinion of the people of the nation in introducing any plan.

It is always unwise, unless absolutely necessary, to compel by law what the sentiment of the nation does not generally approve.

The sentiment of the American people inevitably turns to what is right when they fully understand the matter, and the process of education and discussion is safer in a Republic than the process of compulsion.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has changed his position, then, on that proposition quite recently.

Mr. SPENCER. There is no change on my part.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. SPENCER. Not of the subcommittee. I am a member of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator voted in the committee to report out the bill?

Mr. SPENCER. I voted to report the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. That was only a few days ago.

Mr. SPENCER. It was some weeks ago, but the time is immaterial.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the Senator think if he entertained those views at that time, they should control his vote at this time?

Mr. SPENCER. Perhaps so; but if I am right now—I am sure the Senator will agree with me—he and I both ought to now vote as we believe.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator fully. But what is it that has come up that causes the Senator to change his views?

Mr. SPENCER. I can tell the Senator, and I can tell him frankly. The principle of the bill, which is at the foundation of the whole thing, I had no doubt about in the committee. I have no doubt about it now upon the floor of the Senate. When the bill was before the committee there was no doubt about the right of the principle. Then there was a discussion and a doubt expressed as to whether the proposed plan was the wisest plan for carrying out that principle, and whether the financial burden was greater than ought to be put upon the country now, and whether the public opinion in regard to that question ought not to be considered. All of those questions were in my mind then, and I resolved in favor of bringing the bill to the Senate for its consideration, and I would do the same thing again under the same circumstances. The principle of universal training ought to be considered by the Senate. Whether it is brought before the Senate as a compulsory measure or as a voluntary measure does not matter so much. In either event the principle was bound to be discussed, as it has been, and the judgment of the majority recorded. If a majority of the committee had been in favor of voluntary training, I would have voted to report that plan to the Senate. What I wanted was that the principle of universal training should be considered.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will permit me, I understand when he voted in the Committee on Military Affairs upon the question of compulsory military service he was of the opinion that the sentiment of the country was for it.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator then thought that the sentiment of the country was in favor of compulsory military training?

Mr. SPENCER. I thought the sentiment of the country then was just what I think it is now—greatly divided upon the question.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the Senator to say now that in the event a Senator casts his vote, he should at least consult the sentiment of the country.

Mr. SPENCER. I think so.

Mr. HARRISON. The sentiment of the country being against it, he is willing now to abandon his position with reference to compulsory military training and adopt voluntary military training.

Mr. SPENCER. I did not say in committee, nor do I say now, that the sentiment of the country is against it. I say the sentiment of the country is divided upon the question. Much of the opposition comes from a misunderstanding of the provisions of the measure. Some of the opposition comes from a conviction that it is wrong.

Mr. HARRISON. Why has the Senator changed his views now from what they were when he voted in the Committee on Military Affairs for compulsory military service, as did the other members on the majority side?

Mr. SPENCER. I suffer in my inability to make the Senator from Mississippi understand that I have not changed my views, that I stand on the principle of universal training to-day precisely where I did when I voted to report the bill out to the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I state to the Senator from Mississippi that the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Missouri a few moments ago are exactly the sentiments which he expressed in the committee? There has been no change whatsoever.

Mr. HARRISON. There has been a change in the vote that he is going to cast now from the vote which he cast in the Committee on Military Affairs, and there is a change on the part of other members of the committee on the majority side.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The trouble with the Senator from Mississippi is that he does not know the attitude of the Senator from Missouri in the committee. The Senator from Missouri did not promise in the committee to vote for the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. That is why I asked the question, but the Senator from Mississippi does know that certain members of the Committee on Military Affairs brought in a bill providing for compulsory military service, and most of them, if not all of them, have changed their views, and are trying to put it through the Senate, but have abandoned compulsory military service for voluntary military training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I beg the Senator not to say "all."

Mr. HARRISON. I should state perhaps all with the exception of the Senator from New York.

Mr. SPENCER. I am wondering at the keenness and the anxiety of my friend, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, to inquire into the reason why a Senator did this or that. I would rather consider that the question into which he should inquire is what is the right thing to do when we are brought to a consideration of the bill itself. If I thought I was wrong in the committee, I would not hesitate to change upon the floor of the Senate, and neither would the Senator from Mississippi, for his fearlessness is well known, but there is no occasion to make any change. The fact of the case is that there was a great principle of universal training before the committee. When they came to the application of that principle the method by which it might best be tried out was not so clear.

We now come to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and I answer the third question that I proposed to myself as to what is the right thing for the Senate now to do, by determining to make a fair trial of universal training along the lines of voluntary rather than compulsory enlistment.

The principle can be thoroughly demonstrated by the plan of voluntary enlistment as to whether it is good or as to whether it is bad. If the plan proposed by the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is tried out, what will result?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are the pending amendments, and we want to vote intelligently upon them. They were just submitted to most of us yesterday. The question I wanted to ask was, How much is it going to cost? That is a very important matter, as the Senator knows. I know the Senator's great interest in such matters, as to the means of getting the money to run the Government properly. The question of the cost is a matter that we all should consider. What will it cost if adopted? I have no knowledge, and I would like to have some information.

Mr. SPENCER. I wish I could tell the Senator from Tennessee. I can give him this as an approximate estimate which has been carefully computed, and which I myself believe to be substantially correct, that it will cost about $283 a man. How many will try the training under a volunteer system I do not know. The plan could be demonstrated if in this bill we limited the number of those who would be accepted under a voluntary plan to 100,000 or 200,000, and then the cost would be a mere matter of mathematical calculation, in which the Senator is so quick and so accurate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the Senator think that it would be very wise to limit it so that we would know how much money to appropriate to carry it out? We surely are not going to continue the war-time process of appropriating a lump sum to carry out the projects in such manner as the War Department may determine. We ought to have some figures, and, as I understand the Senator, the only way we can get the figures accurately is to determine how many men we are going to permit to come in under the voluntary scheme, and figure on the basis of the cost of each man.

Mr. SPENCER. That is a detail, Mr. President, which it seems to me should interpose no serious obstacle. Anyone knows that there will not be more than 200,000 who will volunteer. Anyone knows that there will probably be at least 50,000 who will volunteer, and either figure is quite within the possibility of easy computation, and neither figure is excessive, as regards cost, and is negligible in comparison with the benefits.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would like to ask the Senator on what he bases the certainty of 50,000 enlistments under the bill?

Mr. SPENCER. I can only base it upon the general common sense of the situation, as to which the Senator is far better qualified than myself to give a guess. I arrived at it by thinking, first, of my own home city, and then the country towns with which I am acquainted, and then the State, and I think I could easily see that from Missouri there would come all the way from 2,500 to 4,000 men to try it. It would depend a good deal on whether the American Legion got back of it. If the American Legion got back of the voluntary plan, the enlistments would be larger.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I was asking for information. I have a very serious doubt myself of any definite number we could rely on to enter, with nothing on earth offered those who do enter except the limited service, under the rules laid down in the ordinary Army discipline. If the Senator will just permit me, I wish to throw out a suggestion as to whether we could not meet this better somewhat along the line of the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] the other day. Suppose we had a hundred thousand volunteers for one year's service, and with that voluntary service we had the additional feature of an education, and give these hundred thousand men the chance for an education, and have lectures on patriotism and the duty of the soldier and the citizen to his country, giving one year of actual war service. For three or four hours a day give not only an opportunity for an education but compulsory education, and let no man over 21 years of age enlist, and at the end of 10 years we would have ten hundred thousand, and the oldest one would not be over 30 years of age—regularly trained and equipped soldiers. I doubt whether it would cost as much as the present bill will cost. Along that line only can I see any way of inducing an American boy with ambition to enter the Army under the provisions of a voluntary system.

Mr. SPENCER. The mathematics of the Senator from Arizona are unanswerable, and there is a great deal of merit in the plan. The difficulty is not as to whether we would not have a million trained men under 30 years of age if a hundred thousand enlisted every year for 10 years, but the difficulty comes in the fact that at this very day we have the provision for the enlistment for a year, and we can not get the men to enlist.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But you have nothing in the world to offer except the service they will give.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes, we have.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will be glad to be interrupted by the Senator from New York. I think we all recognize the necessity not only of soldiers as trained men but we recognize the necessity also of some inducement above mere service as a private in the Regular Army.

Mr. SPENCER. We have it to-day. But, Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator forgets that three years ago we put into the national-defense act, as I recollect, the provision for vocational education in the Army, and every soldier who enlists in the Regular Army to-day has a right to receive extra instruction in any trade that is carried on the list or the curriculum of the Army, and the number of trades must be 40 or 50. The schools are being conducted to-day at every Army post and every cantonment. I have been to one of them myself, and I have seen hundreds of young men learning how to repair, and in fact to build the minor parts, at least, of every part of an automobile or a truck. When those men went on furlough last Christmas for five days, or a week perhaps, to the city of Baltimore, as their Christmas vacation from the Army, they hired out in local garages for $8 a day, as a result of the benefits which they had received while serving as soldiers in the Motor Transport Corps. The whole Army is building up that system, and to-day, may I say to the Senator from Arizona, any soldier who enlists in the Army for one year or for three years—there being two periods of enlistment at the present time—can have that training.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know that, and that is a most commendable feature which characterizes the Regular Army to-day. But the Senator mistakes my point. Take the boys from the mountains, or the country boys, who have no advantages and no money. They need the rudiments of a regular education. They need lectures by competent men. If this camp of 100,000 citizen soldiers should be made a school, not for education in the arts or in mechanics, but in the books of the world, in the patriotism of our country, in the elevation of their manhood, their devotion to the flag, as a part of the curriculum, and let those 100,000 boys come out and take the additional education of which the Senator from New York speaks, would we not have, at the end of 10 or 15 years, probably, the most patriotic and the best-educated men ready for service any country ever had in the annals of all time?

My idea is that if we could organize our Army along that line and have the inducement of one year of good schools, with the expenses of the soldier paid, his clothes furnished, his money paid him as a soldier, and, in addition to that, knowing that he will be free in a year, with the addition of the education, it would be a temptation in the minds of these boys, unable to be otherwise educated, to take advantage of this service; and it would inure not only to the uplifting of the personnel of the Army, but of the citizenship of America.

Mr. SPENCER. That is precisely what they have to-day; but the enlistments do not come.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator to listen for a moment while I read the language of the bill? I am quite sure the Senator's interest in it has caused him to read it, but I know there are a good many Senators here who have not read this bill at all.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have not paid as much attention to it as I would have done if I had had more time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For instance, section 52, headed "Classes of training," reads as follows:

> The military training and any preparatory education therefor required by this act shall be such as may be prescribed by regulation, and shall include general educational training and vocational training in appropriate trades which may be necessary in war and useful in peace, scientific agriculture, physical training, instruction in hygiene, instruction in American history, principles and forms of government, and such other instruction and training as may be adapted to qualify those receiving it for the performance of their duties,

And so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If I am not intruding too much on the time of the Senator from Missouri, may I ask the Senator from New York what good that will do under this voluntary system?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, I am in favor of the compulsory system.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know; and in your view it is reasonable, but in view of a voluntary system may I ask the Senator what good it will do?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can tell the Senator what good it will do. Will the Senator from Missouri forgive me for taking his time?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is this part of it in which I am just as deeply interested as in the purely military part. To-day the Army is carrying on a recruit educational center at Camp Upton, where men who enlist in the Regular Army and who can not read or write English at all are sent, and those who can read or write so little that they are fearfully handicapped are also sent there.

Last winter there were about 600 men in that so-called recruit battalion there. They sent a platoon down here to Washington of 28 men last winter, and the War Department was courteous enough to inform the Military Affairs Committees of the Senate and the House that the platoon would give an exhibition drill out here on the plaza. Perhaps the Senator and other Senators will recollect that I announced it on the floor of the Senate and begged Senators to go out there and see the exhibition. Unfortunately only three of us went. I wish all 96 had gone. There were 28 men in that platoon. Three months before they were here not one of them could read or write the English language. The day they were here every one of them could read and write the English language. I read the letters which they had written to their families and friends in English. I talked with them. I went in the ranks when they opened ranks after they had given a remarkably proficient drill. Their close-order drill was better than anything I had ever seen.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How long had they been in the service?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only three months. They had volunteered to go into the Regular Army. I talked with those men and asked them about their personal experiences, and perhaps the Senate will forgive me if I tell the Senate about some of them.

The first man I talked to was a Persian, who had fought for 18 months in the Russian Army in the Caucasus, back in 1915, in the great European War. How he ever reached this country, poor boy, I do not know; but he arrived here absolutely helpless, so far as knowing our language or literature was concerned. I had a talk with him and he talked with me intelligently in English. I asked him how he got his meals when he was traveling around, and with perfect confidence he told me, "I ordered them from the menu cards in the dining car"; and that boy could not have spoken a word of English three months before.

The next man I talked to was an Italian. I asked him how long he had been in this country and he said nine years. I asked him, "Is it true that you could not speak English three months ago?" He said that it was. I asked him, "How is it that you stayed in this country over eight years and never learned?" He said, "I lived amongst my Italian-American people. It never was apparently necessary for me to learn the English language and I never learned it. I suddenly realized that I was hopelessly handicapped, and I heard about this thing, and went into the service, and I can speak English."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I rather regret, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, that every man in the Senate did not serve in some army, if he could have learned the English language there in three months. Some of us attended college for four or five years and did not learn it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. These men could all speak English. Of course, I will not say they spoke it without a foreign accent, for they spoke broken English, but they could speak it intelligently and they could read it intelligently.

The next man to whom I spoke was a Dane. He was a native, Mr. President, of the Province of Schleswig-Holstein, which was until the end of the war a part of the German Empire. During the war, as late as 1916, he had been in the German Army as a member of the Prussian Guards, but he had not much sympathy with the Germans because he was really a Dane. He got out of the German Army somehow or other, reached this country, and enlisted in our Army. He was delighted with the treatment that he was getting, and he spoke English very creditably. He rather amused me when I asked him how it was that he could learn so quickly when he said "I have a good brain."

There were Czecho-Slovaks, there were Poles, there were Greeks, there were Persians, and there were Danes; the representatives of 14 different nations in that one platoon of 28 men.

I merely cite this to show what the vocational training and educational side of military service can amount to. None of those men, coming to this country beyond the school age of our several States, could have had a really effective chance to acquire the education which the Army has given them. Of course, they have enlisted for three years, but that is what had happened during the first three months, and that was done in addition to teaching them the military side.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I interrupt further merely to say that before these men came here to Washington every one of them had been naturalized as citizens of the United States, and they were the proudest lot of men I ever saw?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is a very commendable and a very hopeful statement. As I understand the Senator, the men he has named had been foreigners and were enlisted in the Army for three years. I am speaking of giving some inducement to the enlistment in the Army of the American-born boy who has had no great opportunity for educational advancement.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to that suggestion, I wish to call attention to the fact that Col. Reese was before the Joint Committee on Printing this morning, and, if I am not mistaken, he said that to-day there are over 50,000 soldiers in the United States Army who were taking vocational training; and I think over 20 different trades are being taught to-day in the Army vocational schools.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am gratified, and I know every Senator here is gratified, to learn what the Senator from Utah and other Senators have stated. They have not reached the point at which I was particularly aiming; but, begging the pardon of the Senator from Missouri for having interrupted his very interesting speech, I shall not longer keep him off the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I only wish to add that the American people want what is best in universal training. The difference is not so much a difference upon principle as it is an uncertainty as to what is the best plan. Therefore, if the principle, which is unquestioned, can be tried without compulsion, it is the wiser plan to try it with a voluntary body. If it works, at the end of the first year the 50,000 volunteers who will try the four months' training will, every one of them, be an apostle of the plan, and their parents and their communities will understand it. The next year will show the result of their experience; and the voluntary plan, if it works out along the lines of merit which it possesses, will soon by itself develop into a plan that will comprise the great part of the young manhood of the United States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I should like to express the hope that we may secure a vote upon the pending amendment within a few moments, if there is no other Senator who desires to speak. I am called out of town on a very important matter at 3 o'clock and am very desirous of having my vote recorded, and particularly being here to support my own amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for but a moment, and I should not do so at all at this time but for the unexpected attack which was made upon me this morning by the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. There was not a word in anything that I had said that in the slightest degree, as it seemed to me, provoked such an attack. I had not mentioned the name of the Senator from Oregon, and had not thought of him in connection with what I said. The Senator from Oregon is an able and conscientious Member of this body and is usually most conservative. His statements about me are indeed inexplicable.

The Senator from Oregon undertook to show what I advocated four or five years ago, when I was in the other House, was in some way a reflection upon my present attitude, and he quoted from some remarks that I made at that time to prove it. I have since looked at those remarks—of course, I did not recall what I then said, but upon looking up the RECORD, I find that they are precisely what I say now, and what I stand for now. I was not in the remotest sense a pacifist then, and I am not in the remotest sense a pacifist now, in the sense the Senator uses that term.

At that time the question before the Congress was whether we should adopt a bill, prepared in large part by the senior Senator from Oregon, which was known as the compulsory military training bill, and which is substantially the bill that we now have, except that the pending bill is a little more comprehensive and involves considerably more expense. That bill provided for compulsory military service, and the bill now here is largely patterned after it. I was opposed to that bill when it was advocated before the Senate by the Senator from Oregon then just exactly as I am opposed to the compulsory military training bill which is now advocated by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Certain extracts from my speech were quoted by the Senator from Oregon, and in order that there may not be any misunderstanding about the record, I desire to quote precisely what I said at that time. There is not a particle of difference between the position which I then took and the position which I now take; my opposition to compulsory military training was precisely then as it is now. I said at that time:

The Hay bill—

And, by the way, before I read from the RECORD the extract, which is very short, I desire to say that the two measures before the Congress at that time were the Chamberlain bill, providing for compulsory military service, and the Hay bill, which largely increased the Army and provided for its increase by expanding and enlarging the National Guard of the several States. Those two measures, presented as preparedness measures, were fought over just as the pending proposal is being fought over. The advocates of the Hay plan, among whom I was, believed at that time that the Hay bill was a better preparedness measure than the Chamberlain bill; and the advocates of the Hay bill won. We won then just as we are going to win now. It has been demonstrated that that bill, known as the national-defense act of 1916, was a more effective measure than the one which we defeated. Why do I say that? Because we fought the war under the terms of the national-defense act of 1916 and won it, and the very best test of a measure is what is done under it. I do not want to swap our system under which we won for the German system, which we defeated and which Germany has agreed with all the great nations of the earth never to restore. If it is bad for Germany, and in my judgment it was responsible for her downfall, it will prove bad for us. I am for an American military system and not a Prussian system, as this is. The United States never made such a record as its Army made operating under the act of 1916. The conscription act of May 18, 1917, elaborated the national-defense act and added the necessary war powers. I now read from the RECORD what I said on the occasion referred to:

The Hay bill will mean an increase in our Regular Army of nearly 100 per cent and over 200 per cent in the National Guard. It will be by far the cheapest and best way of defending our country, and it will be utilizing units and organizations that already exist. It will not be an untried scheme. The Chamberlain bill is a long step toward militarism. The Hay bill is a democratic measure, and one strictly in accord with our Constitution, our history, the genius of our institutions, and democratic policies.

The Regular Army officers, who it is claimed are behind the Chamberlain bill, as I noticed from the debate in the Senate, printed in the RECORD, naturally do not want the National Guard used in our system—

By the way, I stop here long enough to interpolate that those officers are against the National Guard, and its absolute destruction is provided for in this bill by providing an entirely different system, and one along the lines of the continental army under the so-called Chamberlain bill. The Regular Army officers—naturally do not want the National Guard used in our system because it does not, in the first place, mean rapid promotion for them; and, in the second place, they naturally want to build up as large a standing army as possible. Of course, I do not blame them. They are to be commended for wanting to make the Army effective. I feel quite sure that the continental army can not be recruited, and if not recruited then it is hoped to come back before another Congress and have some sort of compulsory military-service bill passed. Of course, I am opposed to universal compulsory military service, and I am opposed to a large standing army in times of peace. I do not blame these Army officers. It is natural that they should want to make larger the Regular Establishment. But the duty of Congress is to consider only the best interests of the country.

Those were my views then; they are my views now. The additional scheme of voluntary service is proposed. Why? Of course, because it is hoped that eventually there can be engrafted on it the conscript system. That is the desire behind it; it is a step in that direction.

My position is exactly the same to-day as it was then. I have been in favor of a proper national defense at all times; I am in favor of it to-day. I believe in building up our military schools all over the land. It has been a great mistake that we have not devoted more money and more attention to educating the young men of this country in schools where they can be properly trained to become officers, because officers are quite as necessary in time of war as are the men themselves. We should build up our National Guard; we should build up our defense in every proper way. I am not one of those who believe in pacifism, but I believe in a reasonable and democratic defense, and not a Prussianized militarism, as is proposed by this bill. This is all I have to say.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Lenroot	Poindexter
Beckham	Elkins	Lodge	Pomerene
Borah	Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Sheppard
Brandegee	Gay	McCumber	Simmons
Calder	Gore	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.
Capper	Harris	McNary	Smoot
Chamberlain	Harrison	Nelson	Spencer
Colt	Hitchcock	New	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Swanson
Cummins	Kellogg	Nugent	Trammell
Curtis	Kenyon	Page	Wadsworth
Dial	Kirby	Phipps

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. GERRY, Mr. MYERS, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. HALE and Mr. KEYES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have had nothing to say on this question of compulsory military training, and before the vote is taken I desire to speak for two or three minutes on that subject.

Long ago I made up my mind that if this country expected to be prepared to defend itself there was but one course to pursue, and that was to have our citizens so trained in the rudiments of military service as that when they were called upon to enter into active military operations they would have at least a basis of military knowledge laid. I have not changed that opinion. I pretend to no expert military knowledge on the question. The whole matter, in my mind, is based upon common sense, or my conception of what common sense is.

It seems to me a pitiable thing that after so recent an illustration as this country has had of the folly, the criminal futility, the tremendous expense, and the horrible loss of life entailed by the doctrine of pacifism, by the theory that the best way to protect the country is to make no preparation for its defense, within two years there should appear to be a sentiment in the country in favor of lapsing back into the condition in which we have always been, and laying ourselves liable to future panic and possible disaster.

I have listened to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], who says that he joined in the report of this bill to compel the young men of the country to enter these training camps and to acquire this necessary military knowledge; and, having done so, he states that he thinks public opinion ought to be deferred to, and therefore he is not in favor of compulsory military training, but he is in favor of trying what he calls the principle. I suppose he means the principle of voluntary military training.

There is no principle to try out about military training. That principle has been tried, if it ever needed any trial, repeatedly. It is just like everything else. Nobody can be efficient in anything unless he has studied the question.

No man can make a good soldier, no country can rely upon a soldier, who does not know anything about his business. There is not any principle to be tried about that. The only principle to be tried is the principle of whether you will compel men to be prepared or whether you will allow them to decide, as individuals, in the opinion of each individual, whether he wants to prepare or not.

As I say, the question of allowing individual men themselves to decide whether or not the country shall be adequately defended seems to me to be preposterous. This Government has a right to exist. The Government has a right to prescribe such policies as will perpetuate its own safety and existence. In the matter of ordinary mental equipment, in the matter of what a man shall know in order to be allowed to vote, in the matter of what a man shall know in order to be allowed to live in this country at all, we do not submit those questions to the individuals of the country. Every State compels its citizens to go to school, to be educated. I believe in that theory, and I believe it is a correct theory. I believe that in a great democracy the Government has a right to say that each citizen owes it as a duty to the State to be an intelligent citizen, and I believe that the Government ought to prescribe compulsory attendance upon schools. That is the only way to be educated. That is the only way to make democracy safe for us and for this Government.

The only way to make this country safe against attacking nations is to have the people able successfully to repel aggression upon us. It is foolish, in my opinion, to leave that question to the decision of each individual. What principle is there to be determined by experiment again as to whether it is better to have your soldiers trained when they go into battle or not? Did not the camp at Plattsburg demonstrate that its graduates made better soldiers than those who, as the Senator from Oregon showed this morning, were thrown into the front battle line without knowing how to put a cartridge into the chamber of their rifles? I hope we do not need now, after all this experience, to go back to establish the principle of whether it is better to be ignorant or intelligent. There is only one question at issue and that is whether the people of this country owe a duty to the country, and if they do, they ought to be compelled to perform it.

There are a great many features of this thing which seem to me to be pertinent and ought to be touched upon. I have no desire to weary the Senate or attempt to instruct those who are probably better informed about this matter than I am. I simply want to go on record as expressing my own view.

It is said that the country will not need any more men qualified to defend themselves or the country, because we have just disbanded a great Army, to a certain extent a veteran Army, and hence qualified to go into battle. The whole of that Army was not a veteran Army. The whole of it did not see actual military service in battle abroad. A good portion of it never got abroad at all. But having been drafted into the service of the country and performed their duty, assuming that they are fairly well qualified to be drawn again into the service of the United States in case of emergency, what then? Is it true that the country wants to take the position that those who have once stood upon the firing line ready to render the supreme sacrifice for their country, if necessary, are the only ones to be called upon to do it again? Is it true that those who have borne the burden and heat of the day are the only ones who are to be compelled to do it again and that those who come to military age hereafter are only to be trained and competent to perform that duty in case each individual thinks he wants to perform it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is the contention of some that the training of these young men is wholly unnecessary now because we have an Army of 4,000,000 trained men who have just been serving in the World War. But the question is whether it would be fair to call on those men in case of trouble and ask them to make the second sacrifice for their country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We have already drafted an immense army of over 4,000,000 men into the service, and we would have to draft them again. Of course, they would have to go, having such training as they have had. Even assuming that the selective service system were put upon all men of military age in the country and others were drafted along with those, everyone knows that the best qualified men would be sent to the front first.

Suppose we did get 50,000 men voluntarily to take it upon themselves to go to the training camps and attempt to prepare themselves, so far as one can in conditions of peace, for the terrible ordeal of war. Suppose they did get such training as could be furnished under those circumstances, who would those 50,000 young men be? They would be the 50,000 young men who had the highest conception of their duty to the Government; they would be the most patriotic, the most self-sacrificing, the most intelligent; they would be those who would make the best soldiers. They would be those who had an instinct or a tendency to or a fondness for that kind of life. Then what would happen? They would be the first sent abroad next after those who were in the Great War, while the other young men who were drafted would be put into training camps here, to be compelled to acquire a preliminary education in military affairs which the 50,000 most patriotic young men had volunteered to acquire and had acquired.

Then what would we see? We would see the cream of the United States—the first 50,000 or 100,000 young men patriotically volunteering for this service—sent to the front line of battle to hold the line while the other less patriotic men should be rendered as competent as they might be rendered in the short time under the stress of war conditions and the emergency, to go over there and relieve them. What would happen? The same thing would happen that happened in Great Britain when they did not have conscription at the beginning of the war. They relied on their volunteers, and the volunteers, the flower of Great Britain, went to France with their backs to the wall and died in the trenches waiting for the less patriotic men to get such a degree of training as would warrant the authorities in sending them there at all.

It seems to me that that is a disgraceful policy for this country to adopt. It would have been disgraceful at any time. It is not only disgraceful now, but idiotic, and in the light of the experience we have just had it is criminal.

It may be necessary to defend this country at any time. Everybody knows that there are now conditions let loose in the world that never were rampant before. There are nearly 1,000,000,000 people in the Orient, in China, India, Japan, and Russia, the future movements of whom no man can prophesy. All central Europe and southern Europe and northern Africa are in a condition of flux.

The people everywhere are discontented and are liable in those countries to be taken possession of by unprincipled demagogues and agitators and adventurers. Now it is proposed that we shall enter again into that condition of dolce far niente—going to sleep at the switch, relying upon those inspiring words of our peerless leader, Mr. Bryan, that a million men would spring to arms overnight to defend the country whenever needed, to reenter again and live our lives in the fool's paradise from which he has just emerged.

Everyone knows that the question of grabbing a gun and saying, "I am here," does not constitute a soldier. Everyone knows that the next war, if war shall come, will be fought with instruments and by processes which require most expert technical knowledge. Our æroplane service we have heard has practically been abandoned. We all know that the chemical factories and the T. N. T. factories and the supply factories for all sorts of munitions which were erected in this country did not get to their full capacity until just before the armistice was declared, and that the system of voluntary military training and all this class of valuable material and method and system that we have assembled and perfected after two years of the most tremendous exertion by processes which have left us in debt, saddled upon the backs of future generations to the extent of nearly $30,000,000,000, will all disintegrate and go to pieces under this system of making it optional with the citizen to elect whether he will choose to know anything about doing his duty to his country or not.

I can imagine no fairer thing to everyone in the country than to require the boys between certain ages of young manhood to take four months of training. No one need think that that falls with special severity upon the farmers. It falls upon everybody, just as it falls upon them to send their children to school to make good citizens. What is the use of having good citizens raised up in this country to be slaughtered? Is it not fair to the boy we are going to draft and send in to risk his life for the flag and for those of us who are too old to go or can not go or who are disqualified, that we should give him the training so that he will stand some "show for his white alley"? Is it right to send these hay-foot, straw-foot, raw recruits up against flame throwers, poisonous gas, and cold blue steel, utterly unprepared and untrained to meet the opponents against whom we compel them to fight?

It seems to me there are no two sides to the question. If there be a public sentiment which is divided, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] says it is, I for one desire to go on record and have my record clean that my part of this public sentiment is for making the trial, if trial be necessary, of compulsory universal military training to the extent recommended by the committee in this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. McKELLAR. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he has been able, during the opportunity he has had for an examination, to ascertain how many of the officers, numbering some 18,300, provided for in the bill will be required for the compulsory military training system?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senate in its wisdom should see fit to substitute voluntary military training for compulsory universal military training, the best study the committee could make, with the assistance of its advisers, indicated that we could reduce the number of commissioned officers in the permanent personnel by 1,007.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does that mean to leave the military training matter upon an optional or voluntary basis?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does. There can be, however, no reduction in the strength of the permanent personnel, unless, of course, the Senate votes to reduce it.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from New York allow me a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. For how many years would this training continue, either under the voluntary system or the compulsory system? I have not been able to find it in the bill. It prescribes a training of four months, and there may be two months additional, but for how many years? Is it for only one year or is it to continue for a number of years?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator means under the bill?

Mr. NELSON. Under the compulsory features of the bill a man is compelled, between 18 and 21 years of age, to go into camp for compulsory training for four months, and with his consent it may be for two months more. Is that only for one year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. For just one year.

Mr. NELSON. For one year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir; just one year. Then, after being a graduate of the four months' training camp, he is a member of the organized reserves, and within the five succeeding years he is liable to be called twice to maneuvers for two weeks each time.

Mr. NELSON. For five years?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Twice within the five years, for two weeks each time. So his total of training will be four months in camp and one month in maneuvers, making a total out of his lifetime of five months, which I have heard said upon the floor of the Senate is going to militarize the youth of this Nation.

Mr. NELSON. The four months, I understand, are not to be exclusively confined to what I would call military training, training men in the duties of a soldier, but include many other educational features. The bill reads:

> The military training and any preparatory education therefor required by this act shall be such as may be prescribed by regulation, and shall include general educational training and vocational training in appropriate trades which may be necessary in war and useful in peace, scientific agriculture, physical training, instruction in hygiene, instruction in American history, principles and forms of government, and such other instruction—

And so forth.

With such a comprehensive program of general instruction, I do not see how you can make much of a real soldier in four months' training. If he is to box the educational compass, as indicated in the bill, I do not see how you will get your real trained soldier.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suppose the logic of the Senator is that he does not want them to have any training at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee another question. In making the estimate that the abolition of compulsory military training will reduce the number of officers by 1,007, can he state what reduction in the expense or in appropriations that will involve?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The average pay of an officer and his allowances, I think, taking all grades into consideration, from second lieutenant to major general, inclusive, is about $3,500 a year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would mean a reduction of about three and a half million dollars.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That still leaves a wide discrepancy between the number of officers provided for in the House bill and the number provided for in the bill which the Senator has reported. Can he explain out of what circumstance the discrepancy arises?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There will not be such a discrepancy as the Senator describes. Perhaps the Senator's idea that there would be a discrepancy is due to my own fault. I think I said, in answer to a question of the Senator the other day, that the House bill provided for 17,200 officers. I was mistaken in that. That was the figure which had been stated, I think, in the debate upon the floor of the House of Representatives and in the public press, and I took it for granted that it was accurate. I find, however, that the House bill actually provides for 17,832 officers. Taking 1,007 officers off the Senate bill would leave the Senate bill at 16,993 officers, practically 850 officers less than the House bill provides for.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator explain, then, wherein my figures are erroneous? I have made my figures from the Senate bill as follows: General, 1; major generals, 20; brigadier generals, 50; colonels, 609; lieutenant colonels, 685; majors, 2,283; captains, 4,566; first lieutenants, 4,339; second lieutenants, 2,740; medical officers, 1,800; dental officers, 280; veterinary officers, 200; warrant officers, 750.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has added warrant officers. If you are going to add in warrant officers you must add 1,500 to the House bill. They are not commissioned officers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are officers who receive exactly the same pay as second lieutenants.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but they are not classed, nor can they be ranked, as commissioned officers. The Senator asked me how many commissioned officers were provided for in the bill, and I told him 18,000. That does not include 750 warrant officers. But if the Senator is to count warrant officers in the Senate bill, he must count warrant officers in the House bill, and there are almost twice as many.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That, I think, substantially removes the discrepancy.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It more than removes it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WADSWORTH (when Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN'S name was called). The Senator from New Jersey asked me to state that he had to leave town at 3 o'clock, but that if he were present he would vote in favor of the amendment. He is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. KIRBY (when his name was called). On some questions I have been paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is detained on account of illness, but on this particular question he and I would vote alike. I therefore vote "yea" on this question, not regarding my pair as binding, as the Senator from Wisconsin would vote the same way.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], which I transfer to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I observe that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] is not in the Chamber. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], which I transfer to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER] and vote "nay."

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], but under the arrangement that I have with that Senator I am free to vote on this question. I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and in his absence withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. TOWNSEND'S name was called). The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were voting, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay." Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who is absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea." I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence and being unable to secure a transfer I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, is absent. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WARREN. I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who is absent. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from North Dakota having transferred his pair to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 9, as follows:

So Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should have discussed the motion just voted upon at an earlier hour but for the desire of the Senate to accommodate the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. As between a voluntary system of military training and a compulsory system of military training, I feel obliged to cast my choice on the side of the voluntary system.

The letter of President Wilson to Secretary Baker expressing his sympathetic attitude toward universal compulsory military training has just been read to the Senate. I do not find myself in perfect agreement with him in respect to such training. There are some who regard the President's views as infallible excepting when they disagree with him. They reserve to themselves the right to disagree with him in regard to compulsory military training, but deny others the right to disagree with him in regard to conscription, in regard to the League of Nations, in regard to any other subject concerning which they happen to agree with him. For my own part, I accord perfect integrity of views to the President, whether I agree with him or whether I disagree. I claim neither more nor less than that consideration for my own views and for my own convictions.

I may say that sometimes it is a good deal more comfortable for a Democratic Senator to vote with a Democratic President than it is to vote otherwise; sometimes it spares him a great deal of criticism; and, I may say, that it sometimes spares him a great deal of abuse. I have made it a rule to obey my own judgment and my own conscience in the discharge of my duties as a Member of the Senate of the United States. Any other rule of action would be fit only for a toothless suckling at the breast of power.

I feel obliged, Mr. President, to express my own opposition to a system of universal compulsory military training.

I desire also to express the opposition of the people of Oklahoma, whom I have the honor in part to represent in this legislative body. I feel constrained to oppose any measure which might either directly or indirectly lead to the institution of a system of militarism in this self-governing Republic. I think it a vain thing to imagine that we can have a system of mild-mannered militarism in the United States; I think it vain to hope that we can have a benevolent military despotism; I think it worse than vain to imagine that we can establish here in this democracy a considerate and amiable system of military autocracy.

Militarism has certain characteristics which are distinct, which are distinctive, which are unfailing. A system of militarism will sooner or later develop those characteristics, just as the wild boar develops his tusks, just as the tiger develops his claws, just as the eagle develops his talons.

Venom is in the fangs of militarism as certainly as it is in the fangs of the asp and the adder; and, according to my knowledge of natural history, those creatures which have the tusks and the talons, the claws and the fangs, develop a predisposition to use those natural weapons. I think that the system of militarism generates a militaristic spirit; I think that a militaristic spirit intensifies the system of militarism. Out of this vicious circle comes Prussian militarism, and it grows in intensity until it ends in madness.

I think that the one thing which more than all others reconciled the American people to the late war was the hope—the belief—that it would result in the extermination of militarism upon this globe; in the extermination of militarism not in Prussia alone but in all the nations of the earth. It would be most unfortunate if it should turn out that we have exchanged our democracy for Prussian military autocracy. What would it profit a nation like our own if it should extinguish militarism everywhere and lose its own democracy? But how infinitely worse would it be should it exchange its democracy for a system of military autocracy. No disappointment could be more grievous than for the American people to see the foul spirit of militarism, which we have sacrificed so much to cast out of the German Empire, find refuge here in the greatest democracy in all the tides of time.

Mr. President, such an exchange would be a tragic reminder of a description in Dante's Divine Comedy of a terrific combat between a creature in human form and a monster serpent. The combat was fierce, furious, and bloody. Each antagonist inflicted terrible wounds upon the other. There came a pause in the combat. The serpent gradually assumed the figure, the features, and the attributes of a human being. It stood up and spake. The creature in human form gradually developed the form, the posture, and the scaly folds of a serpent; it lay prostrate upon the ground. It glided hissing into the jungle. They had exchanged forms; they had exchanged characteristics. I hope that no such exchange of the characteristics of democracy and of autocracy will come out of the recent struggle.

Mr. President, it is said that the young tiger is a tame and docile creature until it once gets a taste of blood, but from that time forward the thirst for blood and the passion to kill and eat becomes uncontrollable. I merely mean that we should not dally with a danger like this, a danger which has led other nations to their undoing. If we permit similar causes to operate among ourselves we may anticipate that similar misfortunes will overtake us.

I had hoped that an invoice of the fruits of this war might show at least two substantial results of service to all mankind. It may be true that other nations had come to believe that the people of the United States were money-mad, that they worshiped no god but gold, that the dollar mark was our national emblem, and that the people of the United States either could not or would not fight.

It is said, at any rate, that the Kaiser had come to believe that the people of the United States had enshrined gold as their diety and that they could not or would not fight. The Kaiser, at least, has been disillusioned, and I had hoped that this disillusionment was universal. I had hoped that, for a time at least, no nation would become so drunk with power or so arrogant with pride as to challenge this great Republic to combat. I say this not by way of mere vainglory, but because I had hoped that this was a pledge of peace, that this was a safeguard against war; not, indeed, an absolute, unfailing guaranty but an assurance that for many a year to come this Nation, at least, might dwell in peace, unmolested and unchallenged.

The other lesson which I had hoped would be among the fruits of this war was this: The theory obtains in the Old World that it requires two years or more to make a soldier. It may require two years to make a soldier out of the oppressed and the downtrodden people of the Old World; I do not know; but recent experience has demonstrated that it does not require two years to make a first-rate soldier out of an alert, intelligent, and patriotic American youth. In a much less period the American youth was developed into as fine a soldier as ever unsheathed a sword. This had led me to hope that the conviction would be universal; it had led me to hope that this would be regarded as proof conclusive that we did not need a system of militarism in the United States, or rather, I should say—for I do not wish to be offensive—that we did not need a vast Military Establishment in the United States.

Mr. President, I do not believe that a system of universal compulsory military training can be regarded as a measure of urgent importance. It can not be regarded as a measure that ought to be adopted now and that could not be adjourned until the morrow. The League of Nations, at least for the present, is quiescent. Whether or not it will ever rise from the dead I can not say; but it is almost certain that if the treaty be ratified the obligations of article 10 will not be assumed by the United States. Article 10, if ratified as written, would have laid upon the United States an obligation to participate in every war that ever happens upon this globe. A good many things about the league were uncertain, but that was certain—that article 10 would involve the United States in every war that ever happens upon this revolving planet. If we had assumed an obligation of that sort, a system of universal compulsory military training might have been, I will not say desirable, but absolutely indispensable.

To have discharged an obligation to participate in all the wars of all the earth certainly would require very general military preparedness and the facility to act upon the instant; but that obligation has not been assumed.

Mr. President, in placing this construction upon article 10 I am abundantly justified. The treaty of peace was submitted to the Senate by the President on July 10 last. The administration's Army reorganization bills were introduced in the Senate on August 4 and in the House on August 5. These measures were introduced in both Houses of Congress just three weeks after the presentation of the League of Nations to the Senate. They were introduced in both Houses four weeks before the treaty and the league were reported to the Senate by the Committee on Foreign Relations. These measures were presented to both Houses of Congress when the ratification of the treaty was generally, if not universally, expected.

I refer to these as the administration Army reorganization bills, because they had the approval of the Secretary of War, they had the approval of the Chief of Staff, and I assume, as a matter of course, they had the approval of the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. These measures, as I remember, were identical. They provided for a standing Army to consist of 572,000 Regulars in time of peace—an army more than four times as large as our standing Army prior to the war. These measures provided for a reserve consisting of 750,000 men. These measures provided for universal compulsory military training, and also provided for the universal and automatic draft. They provided that in case of war every able-bodied male citizen of the United States between the ages of 18 and 46 years should be automatically drafted into the military service without any further action and without any further authorization on the part of Congress. This made conscription not only a permanent but an automatic part of our military system.

Mr. President, if the league had been ratified with article 10 as written, I am not prepared to say that such a system would not have been indispensable to the Nation's security. Indeed, sir, much as I oppose universal compulsory military training, if the obligation of article 10 had been assumed, it seems to me that safety and necessity alike would have rendered such a system unavoidable. But that obligation has not as yet been assumed, that necessity does not now confront us. The vast Military Establishment was to cost $900,000,000 a year, seven times as much as our Military Establishment cost before the war, and was to be reinforced by a Navy, as suggested at the time, costing $1,000,000,000 a year. This Army and this Navy, as suggested last summer, before the League of Nations had emerged from the Senate committee, were to cost $1,900,000,000, were to cost three times as much as the total expenses of the United States Government for all purposes prior to the war, excepting only the Postal Department, which pays its own way.

This vast military array and this vast military budget would have been necessary had article 10 been ratified, with its universal obligation to war; but, Mr. President, at least for the present, the treaty is slumbering. I do not say that it is dead. I do not know.

There are those who believe that the league itself would be a guaranty of peace and an infallible preventive of war. I envy them such a complacent optimism; but, Mr. President, those who are better advised do not share that illusion. President Wilson is too wise a historian, is too wise a statesman, either to entertain or to express a conviction of that sort. When the President laid the first draft of the League of Nations before the commission in Paris—I hold his speech in my hand—he said, with unreserved candor:

> Armed force is in the background in this program, but it is in the background, and if the moral force of the world will not suffice, the physical force of the world shall.

Mr. President, there is the rub.

In his speech at Indianapolis on September 4 the President said, with equal candor:

> At present we have to mind our own business. Under the covenant of the League of Nations we can mind other people's business.

The President was entirely correct in that declaration. Under the league we can mind other people's business; but, sir, when we acquire the power to mind other people's business, we concede others the power to mind our business. We concede that power to some 45 other nations. If there be any way more direct, more swift, and more certain leading to inevitable trouble I am not aware of it.

In his speech at Spokane on September 12 the President said:

> Our present sovereignty merely extends to making the choice whether we will go to war or not, but this extends our sovereignty to say whether other nations shall go to war or not.

The President was eminently correct in that declaration; but, sir, when we acquire through the league the sovereign power to decide that others shall go to war, we concede to others the sovereign power to decide when we shall go to war. Under article 16 we would have agreed that any nation in this world could automatically have placed this country in a state of war. There, Mr. President, is the consideration that gave us pause. Lord Grey himself declared "the League of Nations is a plunge into the unknown." The editor of the London Post asserts that the league comes not with peace, but with the sword. England is expending four or five times as much on her army now as before the war. Japan is laying the keel of the mightiest dreadnaught of all her navy. These nations have joined the league. They must now arm to carry out the obligations of article 10.

There is another reason why this measure can not be regarded as urgent. We have in the United States to-day 4,800,000 men trained to arms. Four million of them belong to the land forces and 800,000 to the sea forces. I believe that a better band of soldiers, a better band of defenders, never was assembled under the sun. No man can profess fear while these proven champions, these veterans who have stood the test of war, are still among us. I should be the last to impose upon these veterans, or to subject any of these troops to overtime in the defense of their country. The Atlantic and Pacific are still our best fortresses. Our Navy is our first line of defense. With a reasonably strong Navy these trained troops, these veterans, could hold an invading army at bay until we could train fresh defenders to relieve them. But, Mr. President, waiving any objection based upon principle, there are certain objections based upon expediency which warn us against the adoption of this policy now.

It is estimated by the majority of the committee that this training would cost something like $125,000,000 a year to train anywhere from 600,000 to 1,000,000 young men. The minority of the committee estimates that the cost would approximate $550,000,000. Statistics which differ so widely are of very little value; but let us take the middle ground and assume that this training would cost $350,000,000 a year. That is an obligation which we should hesitate to assume at this time. We have a funded and a floating debt of approximately $27,500,000,000, gross. There is an enormous deficit in our revenues for the current year. There are other obligations that can not be adjourned. With these 4,800,000 men trained to arms, should we not hesitate before adding this enormous fixed charge to other unavoidable expenditures of the Government?

I do not doubt that the 4,800,000 men themselves would prefer that this money be laid out in some plan of readjusting them to the industrial and economic life of this country, rather than to rivet upon this country at this time so vast and so expensive a system of military training.

There are other economic considerations which bid us hesitate before rushing into this system. But there is one other point upon which I wish to touch before proceeding to that.

The virtue and value of physical training have been greatly exploited in this debate. I do not believe that they have been appraised too highly. I believe in physical fitness. I think that the disclosures during the recent war of physical unfitness in this country were appalling, not to say a national shame. I go further than that and say a national crime.

I have battled in the Senate for years for a system of rural sanitation, but without avail. I think the time is coming when civilized man will not consent to suffer from preventable disease or preventable evils of any character. I think that the progress of the race in the future will consist largely in a warfare against preventable evils and in a triumph over preventable evils.

No one can deny the value of physical training. A voluntary system, so far as it goes, will provide those advantages, but I have here a statement by Dr. Sargent, who is at the head of an institution in Cambridge, Mass., training those who are to be instructors in physical culture and physical training. It is his conclusion that military training is not the best system to bring about the highest character of physical fitness.

It is declared by those who have made a study of the matter that Germany herself, when she first embarked upon her system of military training, found it inadequate and in some particulars injurious. Germany found it desirable to revise her system, and supplemented her military training with gymnasium exercises. I believe that we can provide physical training and physical fitness without necessarily making soldiers out of our boys.

There is another consideration in this connection. Owing to the large percentage of our population engaged in farming, the farmers sent a larger percentage of boys to the Army than any other class of our people. That was unavoidable under the circumstances. A great many farm boys did not return to the farms. The drift from the country to the city has long been a subject of comment and of regret, but it has been the result of economic forces which were perfectly natural and to which our rural population responded. But we ought not now to accelerate those economic forces.

I say that many of the farm boys did not return to the farms. This has occasioned a great shortage of labor upon the farms of the country and has created a situation far more serious than Senators apprehend as to the food supply of the future. If these boys are assembled in training camps, many of them will never return to the farms. It is rather difficult to find four consecutive months in the year during which these boys can be spared from the farm. But if all of them should return to the farm and if all of them should return to their other pursuits, there would yet be an enormous loss in the productive energies of the country during the four months they were assembled in their camps.

As production is the most urgent demand of the hour, it seems to me that no policy should be adopted which would arrest or diminish production when that need is so imperious.

Mr. President, this brings me to the consideration of the high cost of living. It has been much discussed, but a great deal of the discussion has not been very illuminating. Perhaps I shall add to the darkness which already enshrouds the subject.

The high cost of living is not a new problem under the sun. This problem often trails a great war as the ravens trail the army. It followed the Civil War. It is due in large measure to the enormous destruction of life and of labor and of capital and of productive forces and energies. In large measure the high cost of living is but an unavoidable part of the price of waging and winning a great war. Does anyone imagine that a war of such colossal proportions, involving so much sacrifice of capital and life, could be waged without disturbing all industrial and economic relations?

There are three distinct factors which have operated and which have cooperated to raise the problem of the high cost of living in this country and throughout the world. First is the decrease of supplies available in the world; second, the increase of demand throughout the world; and, third, the inflation of currencies and credits, an inflation which is world-wide.

There were some 27,000,000 men under arms in the recent war—27,000,000 men withdrawn from productive pursuits, 27,000,000 men who but for war would have been engaged in producing the necessaries and comforts of life. Their energies were withdrawn from production, while, on the other hand, they became extraordinary consumers of the supplies which were available. Twenty-seven millions of men were engaged in killing each other instead of being engaged in producing things to eat and wear and ministering to the wants and needs of men. This decrease in the world supplies would have raised the problem of the high cost of living even if the demand had remained normal, but demand did not remain normal. Demand, like supply, has been disturbed. Demand has increased and is still increasing.

The belligerent powers were subjected to certain involuntary restraints upon consumption. In addition to that they laid certain voluntary restrictions upon their consumption.

In addition to this the neutral powers were subjected to involuntary and assumed certain voluntary restrictions upon their consumption. This lessened for the time the pressure of demand against the diminished supplies. The central allies were under blockade and the pressure of their demands did not register in the world's markets. The blockade is over. They have reentered the market places with considerable effective demand and with tremendous potential demand for the world's already limited supplies. In addition to this, to use the phrase of the street, times have been flush. Prosperity is abounding; employment is general, if not universal; the people have money to spend; people are buying more than they bought in other times. This brings an incalculable demand into the market as against the diminishing supplies available for that demand.

These concurring causes operating to intensify the demand would have raised and would have aggravated the problem of the high cost of living, even if the supply had been normal. But if supply and demand had both been normal, there is still another factor which would have raised the problem of the high cost of living. I refer to inflation, the inflation of the paper money and the inflation of the credits of the world.

Inflation is too moderate a term. It has been a deluge. Nothing like it ever happened in all history. It is a matter of regret that accurate statistics are not available upon this point. I have seen estimates of the issues of paper moneys throughout the world varying from $40,000,000,000 all the way up to $250,000,000,000. A divergence of this sort in statistics, of course, discredits them all; but it is not necessary to be exact as to the amount of the inflation. Its existence and its evils are self-evident—not only self-evident but universal.

The Comptroller of the Currency in his last report estimates that at the end of the year 1918 paper issues aggregated $69,000,000,000 in the world. Mark you, that was more than fifteen months ago. Twenty-eight billion dollars of that were in Russia. I have seen a recent estimate by a respectable authority placing paper issues in the world at $121,000,000,000, but a difference of $40,000,000,000 ought not to be material. I do not mean to trifle with trifles in discussing a great question like this, but there can be no doubt that the paper-money issues of the world now aggregate something like $100,000,000,000.

Prior to the war there were about $15,000,000,000 of money on the globe, $9,000,000,000 of which was gold and $6,000,000,000 of which was paper, practically all of which was redeemable in gold. This $6,000,000,000 of paper have been increased to something like $100,000,000,000. That increasing prices should follow in the train of such inflation is just as certain as the night treading upon the heels of day—perfectly inevitable. If all advances or if inflation acted and reacted upon all economic forces at exactly the same time and in exactly the same proportion, it would not occasion any problem as to the high cost of living.

I mean this: If prices and wages and interest and rents and profits and salaries all advance with equal step, and at the same moment, inflation would create no problem as to the high cost of living. Changes which do not effect the ratios would not raise the problem. It is the disturbance of ordinary ratios. Prices, I take it, advance first, perhaps profits second, possibly wages third, interest and rents linger, salaries are the last to respond to inflation, and the salaried class are among the first and the worst to suffer. That would include teachers, ministers, clerks, and others who have fixed salaries which do not easily respond to the upward tendency. Eighteen thousand schools were closed during the last year. To these must be added those whose incomes are fixed, and which arise from long-time interest-bearing securities and long-time rental contracts.

Mr. President, these are the three major factors, as I analyze the problem and the situation. To these, perhaps, should be added the profiteer and profiteering, although economists are still engaged in a discussion as to whether profiteering is the cause or the effect of advancing prices.

Mr. President, I have but this to say on that point: Any man who would fatten and batten upon the misfortunes of his countrymen in time of stress and peril deserves the severest reprobation. Whatever good can come from the prosecution and punishment of the profiteer will, of course, contribute that much to the solution of the problem and to the relief of this situation.

Deflation is another remedy. It must come. Contraction of the currency must follow upon this enormous inflation. Deflation has its evils quite as striking, if not so crushing; and sometimes they are more crushing, I may say, than the evils of inflation. Our chief concern should be to see that we come down upon the lock-and-dam system, instead of rushing down by way of the cataract. I merely throw this out as a general observation in coming to the point which I wish to press.

The fundamental solution of this problem, Mr. President, is to be found in increased production. Of course, there are two methods—decreased consumption and increased production. Either one, or both cooperating, would solve this problem. I shall not discuss decreased consumption. That is largely an individual or voluntary affair, at least until a crisis shall come upon the country, and such a remedy as that is worse than the disease itself. But I say that increased production upon the farm, in the factory, in the forest, in the mine, is the solution. In that way real relief lies, and in no other.

Mr. President, the farmer must be the primary factor in the application of this remedy. Food and clothing, the raw materials wherewith to feed and clothe the world, must come from the farm. This accentuates the importance of the farmer as a factor in the present economic situation.

I believe the farmer will solve this problem if he is let alone, if he is not harried, if he is not harassed too much, if he is not too much discouraged.

Mr. President, I merely observe in passing that the Lever Act, passed as a war measure, entailed a needless loss upon the wheat farmers of this country of more than a billion dollars. I believe the farmer was the only class whose prices were fixed arbitrarily by a committee and not fixed as a result of an agreement upon the part of the producers concerned.

I know there are those who stigmatize the farmer as a profiteer. I desire to enter a plea of not guilty. Mr. President, the dean of the Agricultural College of Ohio, which is a part of the State University of Ohio, issued a recent statement, in which he declared that the farmers of Ohio received for their crop of 1918 only 3 per cent more than for the crop of 1917. That reflected a slight advance. But, sir, the cost of production in 1918 was 19 per cent more than in 1917. While there was a nominal increase in the price, there was an actual loss in profits, owing to the advanced cost of production. The increased cost of machinery and of labor upon the farm has not been taken into account by those pseudo-economists who have felt justified in characterizing the farmer as a profiteer.

I wish to insert at this place, Mr. President, a table showing the purchasing power of 1 acre of wheat in 1909 and in 1919, prepared by the Department of Agriculture. It will show that the farmer's purchasing power has declined as compared with other industries, and that, sir, is the crucial test. Can he buy more or less with a given quantity of his product?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. GORE. I also wish to insert at this point a schedule showing the prices of farm implements paid by the farmers before the war and since the war. I do this, Mr. President, because I wish to appeal to the conscience of the consuming classes of this country.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Price of farm implements.

Articles.	Before the war.	April, 1920.
Wagons	$85	$185
7-foot binder	160	270
Riding cultivator	33	65
Sulky plow	45	90
Lister and corn and cotton planter	45	95

Mr. GORE. Information as to the cost of production is essential if we conduct agriculture as a science and as a business. No business can be carried on without the keeping of a cost sheet. Yet much of our farming has been done without the keeping of a cost sheet. Farmers have sold their products without realizing fair wages for themselves and their families, and without receiving any return for the fertility which they withdrew from the soil and marketed in their products. I think the consumers of this country have enlightened and sensitive consciences. Consumers have revolted against convict-made goods. Consumers do not insist upon buying convict-made goods at low prices as against the product of free labor. Consumers of this country have revolted against articles which are produced in the sweat shops. The consumers of this country are not beguiled by a serenade in the form of "The song of the shirt." They are willing to pay reasonable prices, as I believe, and are willing to pay reasonable profits to those who feed and clothe them. For that reason I have insisted, in season and out, here in the Senate and elsewhere, upon a system of cost accounting upon the farms, or rather upon the Government's assisting the farmers to introduce a system of cost accounting.

Mr. President, there is another risk which the farmer can not shift, there is another burden which he can not escape, there is another evil which he must face, and that is the weather risk. "The farmer is the servant of the seasons," and the weather risk can not be eliminated from agriculture. I wish to show the Senate what I mean.

In 1910 the cotton farmers of the South produced 11,600,000 bales of cotton. For that crop they received $810,000,000. The very next year, in 1911, the same farmers produced upon the same farms 15,600,000 bales of cotton, produced exactly 4,000,000 bales of cotton more than the preceding year, and sold the entire crop for $749,000,000; sold the crop of 15,600,000 bales for $60,000,000 less than they realized for a crop of 11,600,000 bales. That 4,000,000 bales of additional cotton which they contributed to the service of mankind lost them $60,000,000. It was worth to them $60,000,000 less than nothing, not to take account of the increased cost of gathering the crop. In other words, if the farmers of the South in 1911 had burned 4,000,000 bales of cotton it would have meant at least $60,000,000 to them. Of course, no farmer would consider vandalism or incendiarism of that sort. They contributed 4,000,000 bales of cotton to the use of mankind, to clothe the naked and to minister to the needs of mankind, and they were penalized in the sum of $60,000,000 for that contribution of 4,000,000 bales of cotton.

That is not peculiar to cotton. In 1915 the wheat farmers produced 1,025,000,000 bushels of wheat. They realized for that crop $942,000,000. The very next year the wheat farmers produced only 639,000,000 bushels of wheat and realized for that crop $1,020,000,000. They produced 400,000,000 bushels less of wheat and realized $80,000,000 more for the harvest. If they had produced 400,000,000 bushels less the year preceding, it would have meant at least $80,000,000 in their pockets. But, sir, it would have meant famine and starvation to the world, and the serious crippling of the prosecution of the war to so early a victory. I could multiply instances as to corn, potatoes, and other agricultural products. To me, Mr. President, this is the riddle of the Sphinx in the business of agriculture. I have not devised a solution—a way to obviate or distribute the weather risk.

I refer to farming as a business advisedly. The time was when, in a strict sense, it was not a business, when the farm was a self-sufficing economic unit, when the farmer produced what he consumed and consumed what he produced, when he did not produce for the market, or when that was not his chief concern. If he had a surplus, it was marketed; but that was an incident. He produced for his own subsistence.

That, however, is all changed. To-day the cotton farmer does not spin and weave and wear the cotton he produces. The wheat farmer does not mill and consume the flour from the wheat which he produces upon his own farm. He produces for the market; he produces a commodity of commerce, and he satisfies his wants in the market place. This makes farming a business, and a business which responds as sensitively to market conditions and to price fluctuations as any other business in the land.

Mr. President, this accentuates the importance of stimulating and encouraging production in this country and at the same time seeing to it, so far as we can, that the producer is not penalized. If he produces a generous harvest, he ought not to be subjected to a fine as a convict or felon, but he should receive a reward in proportion to his contribution to society.

There was a campaign—a one-sided campaign—started against the high cost of living last July or August. It has not been a signal success. It is true that the prices of hogs and cattle were driven down. Hogs went down from 22 cents to 13 cents a pound—a drop of nearly 50 per cent—and the pity of it is that as hogs went down they met bacon going up.

Mr. President, there is a source of justified discontent on the part of the farmers of this country. When the farmer sells a pound of cotton for 27 cents and pays $4.50 cents for a pound of cloth manufactured from it he is likely to complain. The farmer receives less than $9 for 4½ bushels of wheat, which are necessary to make a barrel of flour. A barrel of flour sells from $12 to $14. A barrel of flour will make two hundred and ninety-four 1-pound loaves of bread. At 10 cents a loaf, this amounts to $29.40. The dean of the Agricultural College of Ohio is my authority for the statement that when these loaves of bread are sold in orders at hotels and cafés they bring $270 in the aggregate. The producer receives less than $9; the ultimate consumer pays $270. He would be a rather unobservant farmer who would not mark the spread in these prices.

Mr. President, the withdrawal of the boys from the farms at this time for military training would aggravate this evil. This is my reason or, if I may say so, my excuse and apology for this digression into the economics of agriculture. It is a subject that deserves more consideration than it has received in the past; it is a subject which must receive more consideration in the future than in the past if our prosperity is to continue and if evil times are not to come upon us.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Gronna	Lodge	Reed
Capper	Harris	McKellar	Sheppard
Chamberlain	Harrison	McNary	Simmons
Cummins	Hitchcock	Moses	Smoot
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Sterling
Dial	Kellogg	Nelson	Trammell
Gay	Kendrick	New	Wadsworth
Gerry	Keyes	Norris	Warren
Gore	Lenroot	Ransdell

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CALDER, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. SPENCER, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. KENYON, Mr. COMER, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. MCCORMICK, and Mr. COLT entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask for the consideration at this time of the amendments presented by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The READING CLERK. On page 65, line 5, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert "who have been citizens for at least 10 years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to this amendment, for I think, perhaps, some Senators were not listening when it was read. The amendment, if adopted, will prohibit any man being trained of his own volition unless he has been a citizen of the United States for 10 years. I do not believe the Senate should inflict such a penalty upon foreign-born citizens of this country.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, previous to and during the late war with Germany our country experienced great trouble with the foreign-born citizen who had been in this country for just a short time. Under this bill we allow a man to be trained in the Army before he is a citizen of the United States; he is only required to state that he desires to become a citizen. I think under all the circumstances 10 years is a short enough time for a man to be in this country to enable him to belong to our Army.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, to me it seems that if these people are here, the sooner we catch them and teach them what is necessary, the better it will be. Why a man who knows nothing about military affairs and has declared his intention of becoming a citizen of this country should be practically exempted from military training for 10 years I do not see.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. NEW. I thought the Senator from Connecticut had concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have.

Mr. NEW. I simply wish to supplement what the Senator from Connecticut has said by calling the attention of Senators to a certain incident that most of them will remember, namely, the exhibition that was given in front of the Capitol less than six months ago by a company of just such men as will be prohibited from joining the Army if the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia shall prevail. Ninety days before those men were here in uniform but one of the whole company could speak the English language.

In that 90 days they had been trained into shape, they made a splendid appearance, they spoke the English language, at least to a sufficient degree to enable them to receive and obey commands given in that language, and I think the progress of which their appearance gave evidence was an object lesson to every Senator who saw them. Their advance in citizenship had been of the most pronounced character; and all of that will be impossible if such an amendment as is proposed shall be adopted. I hope it will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia has two further amendments, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 65, lines 6 and 7, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

> And all male persons who reside therein and who have declared their intention to become citizens.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

The READING CLERK. Also, the following amendment:

> On page 65, line 19, after the word "months," it is proposed to insert the following words: "And all applications to participate in training shall be submitted to the adjutant general of the State in which the applicant is a resident, and forwarded to the War Department with the approval of the governor of said State.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, this amendment requires every person who wishes military training to make application through the adjutant general of the State in which he resides, and this must be approved by the governor. In every State there are undesirable citizens who would not reflect credit on our Government as soldiers. They are best known to their neighbors and the county officials, and the governor of a State could get this information better than the Secretary of War at Washington.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I merely desire to call brief attention to this amendment. In effect it provides that no young man, even though he may want the training and applies for it, can have it unless the governor of his State says he can have it. I do not believe the Senate cares to inject such an element into this matter of voluntary training.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] must be first disposed of before that of the Senator from Tennessee is in order.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment proposed by me having been accomplished in an indirect way by the substitution of the voluntary for the compulsory system, and on account of our inability to get a vote on the particular question involved in my amendment, I withdraw the amendment that I have proposed, if I have the consent of the Senate to do so, in order that the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee may be presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee withdraw the amendment to which the Senator from Arkansas offered his amendment?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I do, and offer the one which I send to the desk in lieu of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. Beginning on page 65, line 4, it is proposed to strike out all of sections 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, and 61, found on pages from 65 to 76, and being that portion of the bill which provides for universal compulsory military training.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This amendment will give rise to a good deal of discussion. I do not know what is the desire of the Senate about continuing the session further to-day. It is now 25 minutes of 5 o'clock.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to have a short executive session.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have understood that there is some desire among Senators to have an executive session.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. During the morning hour the Committee on Foreign Relations was in session and I was necessarily absent from the Senate Chamber. I therefore ask unanimous consent, out of order, to report back favorably with amendments from the Committee on Pensions the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War; to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines; and to certain Army nurses; and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases; and I submit a report (No. 512) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 10, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 9, 1920.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We wait upon Thee, our Father in heaven, for wisdom to guide us in our quest for truth.

We thank Thee that Thou hast made us progressive beings and placed within our reach the means for the betterment of our condition—physically, intellectually, morally, spiritually.

The fact that the race has passed from savagery to barbarism, from barbarism to civilization, is the guaranty for the still betterment of life and its conditions.

Give us wisdom, grace, harmony, brotherly love; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks of my own upon the subject of reducing the number of civil employees in the Government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 189) authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution 189, authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

TERMINATION OF STATE OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order debate upon the peace resolution is now in order.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on the Democratic side argue that the House of Representatives under the Constitution is not a part of the treaty-making power, and that the passage of this resolution by the House is an infringement on the constitutional prerogatives of the President, who is charged with the negotiation of treaties.

It must be understood by gentlemen that this resolution is not a treaty, nor does it assume to take away any of the President's treaty-making rights. The Congress under the Constitution is charged with declaring war and raising and maintaining armies and navies. The President under the Constitution is made Commander in Chief of the armies and navies and as such is charged with the responsibility of directing these forces in time of war.

On November 11, 1918, the President appeared before a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives of the American Congress and submitted the terms of the armistice signed by Germany, and in the following words declared the war was over:

> The war thus comes to an end; for, having accepted these terms of armistice, it will be impossible for the German command to renew it.

Later he proceeded to Paris to negotiate a treaty of peace, and upon his temporary return, before the completion of that work, he announced to the American people that he intended to urge the formation of a league of nations and have it so interwoven in the treaty of peace that it would be impossible for the Senate to unravel it.

He kept that promise. And when he finally returned, after the treaty of Versailles was signed by the allied nations and the President, representing the American people, he submitted the treaty for consideration by the Senate, and has continued to insist upon its ratification without amendment. Fortunately for the Nation, the Senate has insisted upon the incorporation of reservations intended to protect the United States from entangling alliances with the nations of the world, and to make clear the responsibilities to be assumed by this country under the provisions of the treaty.

I take the liberty of setting forth the resolution of ratification with the reservations presented by the Republicans of the Senate during the consideration of the treaty, and adopted by a majority of the Senate, but failing to receive the two-thirds necessary:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers, and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers:

1. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provide.

3. No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, Part I, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

6. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles.

7. No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible, as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties.

8. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply to the United States' proportionate share of the expense of the office force and salary of the secretary general.

10. No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress, and the United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than such covenant-breaking State, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

12. Nothing in articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto, or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

13. The United States withholds its assent to Part XIII (arts. 387 to 427, inclusive) unless Congress by act or joint resolution shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said Part XIII, and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.

14. Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate shall be entitled to cast, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate have cast more than one vote.

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

15. In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when such government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

It must be obvious to everybody who has studied the question that if the treaty had been ratified as presented by the President of the United States, this country would to-day have an Army of anywhere from twenty-five to two hundred thousand in Armenia and would have obligated itself to the expenditure of not less than $757,000,000, and perhaps a billion dollars, as indicated by the report of the American commission headed by Maj. Gen. Harbord, after a comprehensive study of the conditions on the ground.

It now appears, as the result of this study, how unfortunate it would be for the United States to have accepted a mandatory over Armenia, as the following reasons given by the Harbord Commission show, as it undoubtedly would have done if the Senate had ratified the treaty with the President's covenant of the league without amendment:

1. The United States has prior and nearer foreign obligations and ample responsibilities with domestic problems growing out of the war.

2. This region has been a battle ground of militarism and imperialism for centuries. There is every likelihood that ambitious nations will still maneuver for its control. It would weaken our position relative to the Monroe doctrine and probably eventually involve us with a reconstituted Russia. The taking of a mandate in this region would bring the United States into the politics of the Old World contrary to our traditional policy of keeping free of affairs in the Eastern Hemisphere.

3. Humanitarianism should begin at home. There are a sufficient number of difficult situations which call for our action within the well-recognized spheres of American influence.

4. The United States has in no way contributed to and is not responsible for the conditions, political, social, or economic, that prevail in this region. It will be entirely consistent to decline the invitation.

5. American philanthropy and charity are world-wide. Such a policy would commit us to a policy of meddling or draw upon our philanthropy to the point of exhaustion.

6. Other powers, particularly Great Britain and Russia, have shown continued interest in the welfare of Armenia. Great Britain is fitted by experience and government, has great resources in money and trained personnel, and though she might not be as sympathetic to Armenian aspirations, her rule would guarantee security and justice. The United States is not capable of sustaining a continuity of foreign policy. One Congress can not bind another. Even treaties can be nullified by cutting off appropriations. Nonpartisanship is difficult to attain in our Government.

7. Our country would be put to great expense, involving probably an increase of the Army and Navy. Large numbers of Americans would serve in a country of loathsome and dangerous diseases. It is questionable if railroads could for many years pay interest on investments in their very difficult construction. Capital for railroads would not go there except on Government guaranty. The effort and money spent would get us more trade in nearer lands than we can hope for in Russia and Roumania.

Proximity and competition would increase the possibility of our becoming involved in conflict with the policies and ambitions of States which, now our friends, would be made our rivals.

8. Our spirit and energy can find scope in domestic enterprises or in lands south and west of ours. Intervention in the Near East would rob us of the strategic advantage of the Atlantic, which rolls between us and probable foes. Our reputation for fair dealing might be impaired. Efficient supervision of a mandate at such a distance would be difficult or impossible. We do not need or wish further education in world politics.

9. Peace and justice would be equally assured under any other of the great powers.

10. It would weaken and dissipate our strength, which should be reserved for future responsibilities on the American Continent and in the Far East. Our line of communication to Constantinople would be at the mercy of other naval powers, and especially Great Britain, with Gibraltar and Malta, etc., on the route.

11. These institutions have been respected even by the Turks throughout the war and the massacres, and sympathy and respect would be shown by any other mandatory.

12. The peace conference has definitely informed the Turkish Government that it may expect to go under a mandate. It is not conceivable that the League of Nations would permit further uncontrolled rule by that thoroughly discredited Government.

13. The first duty of America is to its own people and its nearer neighbors. Our country would be involved in this adventure for at least a generation, and in counting the cost Congress must be prepared to advance such sums less such amounts as the Turkish and trans-Caucasian revenues should afford.

The League of Nations would have committed the United States to the protection of the political integrity and geographical boundary lines of every nation in the world. It would have forced the country into every European quarrel. It would have authorized the council of the league, consisting of nine members, to direct when, and how, and where the people of the United States should send their sons into battle. It would have forced American boys in large numbers to serve in countries of loathsome and dangerous diseases. It would have required a constant increase in the Army and Navy for this purpose, and would force upon the American people the necessity for conscripting American boys to fight foreign wars without choosing which side they were to fight on.

The League of Nations would have committed America's national ideals to a body of men whose customs, languages, standards of conduct, and race habits are not in keeping with our own. America would have but one vote in the council of this league and would be powerless to prevent any action which the council might choose to take. It would have swept aside the Constitution and carried us irresistibly into the Old World currents. It would have made us participants in the 1,000-year-old feuds of European nations. It would have committed the destinies of a free people into the keeping of a hidden power over whose actions we would have no control. It would have forced us to be internationalists instead of nationalists. It would have placed upon us untold burdens, the extent of which no man could foresee. It would have left our boys to bleach their bones upon battle fields in wars in which we had no interest. It would have modified the Constitution of the United States by a method contrary to the provisions now provided by the Constitution itself, and left the Representatives of the people of the United States in the Congress with nothing to do but vote men and money whenever so directed to do by the council of the league.

Most of the European wars have had their origin in commercial rivalry, resulting in territorial aggression. The rulers of European nations have fought to gain power for themselves and their dependent relatives. Their ambitions have never taken into consideration the rights of the people. They have used the people as a pawn to advance themselves. The life of the people with them has had no value, except as they were able to use it on the battle fields to promote their power. Surely the people of the United States must feel grateful to the patriotic men who represent them in the Senate for their insistence upon Americanizing the covenant of the league which would impose such burdens, if adopted without amendment.

The ratification of the league without amendment would have given the people of Europe power over the people of the United States, and this power would undoubtedly be used for the promotion of European interests, regardless of its effect or its cost in blood and treasure to the American people.

We have responsibilities of our own at home. They should receive our first consideration. We have many problems of great moment demanding our attention. They should be our first care. We should not place upon the shoulders of the American people the calamities and burdens of the earth. The ratification of the League of Nations without amendment would force us to do that.

The men who first inhabited Continental America were a sturdy lot. They came here to escape tyranny and to find liberty. They endured the privations of the pioneer. They felled the forests; they cultivated the soils; they fought the Indians; and they established the foundations of an enduring Republic having freedom for its purpose. We enjoy the blessings of this freedom to-day. Shall we jeopardize it or shall we preserve it? Shall we develop along broader lines the peaceful industries of the Nation, or shall we join in the intrigue of foreign nations and become a part of the forces which they command? Shall we protect America against unholy alliances or shall we become internationalists?

We live in the greatest land under the sun. We have enjoyed the blessings of liberty handed down to us by our forefathers, and our people have shown their courage to defend that liberty on every battle field where the honor of the Nation was at stake. We should under no circcumstances jeopardize the freedom of the Western Hemisphere at the solicitation of any dreamer or doctrinaire. We are a people of peace. After every war which our men have fought they have returned to their homes and families and the cares of private life. They have been willing to pursue the policy of developing peaceful industries and have gone to war only when the Nation's honor was at stake.

Our forefathers framed a government to save in peace what they had gained in war in the early days, and we are asked by the President to create something that will lose in peace what we won in war.

The founders of the Government left a solemn warning to their descendants to safeguard human rights; to foster the liberty which they had established. They warned us against entangling alliances with foreign nations. They knew and hated the kings and nobles; they hated their cruelties and customs; they admonished us to let Europeans settle their own quarrels; but the President advises otherwise, and he objects because the Senate of the United States, a coordinate branch of the Government, with treaty-making powers, insists upon the protection of American rights.

We entered into no alliance with Europe when we declared war. We considered Germany a menace to free government. She had murdered our citizens, sunk our ships, destroyed our property, and prevented our commerce on the high seas. There was nothing for us to do but to protect our interests and the interests of our people. We did that, but we were careful not to enter into any alliance with the allied nations who were fighting Germany. We sought no world dominion; we simply wished to protect American rights. We accomplished that purpose by the successful termination of the war; but the President, even now, 17 months after the close of the war, still insists on keeping the Government of the United States in a state of war, and this resolution is simply intended to declare a state of peace and incidentally to repeal the war powers granted to the President during the period of the war in more than 30 acts, which he is now exercising and which he ought not longer to be permitted to exercise. The people of the United States should be permitted to go their way in peace; to conduct their affairs without war restrictions; to enter upon their legitimate concerns with a knowledge that there is no danger of them infringing upon a war right.

This resolution is perfectly within the power of the Congress and the House has the right to originate it. The President, the treaty-making power, has refused to act; he has refused to consider amendments to the League of Nations, to which he seems to be wedded. He professes to believe that the people of the United States are in favor of the league on the ground that it would bring peace. God knows we are all for peace, but the League of Nations, far from bringing peace, will involve us in continued war; but to the extent that the United States can properly enter the league without yielding its sovereignty to the control of foreign powers I should be glad to see it formed with America as part of it, but with a league that surrenders any American right to any foreign nation with the power of any council of any league controlled by anybody outside of the United States to dictate policies to the American people, I am opposed unalterably, now and always.

Since the President has refused to act, refused to consult, refused to compromise, it seems to me the time has come for the voice of the people to be heard, and this resolution presumes to express their views, for I verily believe that four-fifths of the American people are for America, whatever the other one-fifth may be for, but for America I stand. I want to see the League of Nations covenant Americanized. I am not an internationalist; I am a nationalist, with all that the term implies. I believe that the United States, as an independent entity with all its power and wealth and its sense of justice, can be more useful to the world without alliances of the kind provided in the President's covenant of the league unamended than it can be as a member of such a league. It stands out with its hand held aloft, beckoning the people of the world onward toward freedom and justice; its food supply, its wealth, its power, and its men are always at the service of the world where justice is at stake. It should hold itself aloof from all alliances; it should be ready to meet whatever issue comes. It should join in its own way, at its own free will, under the direction of its own Government, and with the consent of its own people, in any movement for the world's betterment, but it should do so freely, without coercion, without dictation, without orders. It should be in fact what it is in name, the paramount spokesman of the world's liberty and eternal justice. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of the League of Nations. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made a very able address, at which no one from his viewpoint could take grievance; but that is not the issue before us. All of us, I believe, every man on both sides of this House, want to see the United States Government at peace with our late enemy. We are not the peace-making power under the Constitution. This branch of the Congress has no right to interfere with the President and the Senate in respect to the League of Nations and the treaty that the Senate has been considering all these long, weary months. Neither have we the power under the Constitution to usurp the authority to pass such a resolution as is now pending before this body. No one knows this fact any better than does the Republican majority. Any man who understands practical politics can readily perceive that this resolution is pure demagoguery and humbuggery. Any man who runs can read that. Replying to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], I beg to say that the cooked, poisoned fish that he proposes to swallow along with the Republicans, endeavoring to fool the American public, will not be swallowed by me, and it will not be swallowed by the great majority of the Democrats of this Congress. The idea of standing up and doing such a thing under our oath as Members of the American Congress, which we took to uphold the Constitution in all its sanctity and its legality, is repulsive. We would subvert the Constitution of this great Government by passing this contemptible resolution. It would be an insult to the boys who wore the uniform of this great Nation, who went out to fight for the principles for which this Government was founded, as well as for the civilization of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The people of our country gave freely of their treasure and made burdensome sacrifices, and to now pass this hypocritical resolution would cast ignominy upon us all. Can we, as intelligent and patriotic Americans, face the people who contributed down to the very bottom of the till to the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A., who subscribed for Liberty bonds, if we should pass this resolution? Above all, could we face the mothers who gave their sons, some of whom lie now yonder in the soil of France, with the poppies blowing above their graves, while those mothers grieve for them at home? You pretend to represent the American people and to pass this contemptible and hypocritical resolution and leave the enemy free from being bound to stand by and support the great victory that our soldiers won as set forth in the treaty which was made to safeguard and protect us. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, of course it is impossible within the limits of 10 minutes to enter into a real discussion of the questions which this resolution raises. I desire only to offer a few words of comment on two or three phases of it. As I conceive the present situation, as it relates to peace and to the treaty of peace, the authorities on whom the Constitution imposes the duty and in whom it vests the power of negotiating peace have failed to perform that duty, and entirely, as I look at it, because of political conditions. The Senate, I fear, has failed thus far, seriously and earnestly, to exercise its fullest endeavors in the discharge of its treaty-making duties and power. The result of the temporary deadlock thus created is that after nearly 10 months of delay, accompanied by every kind of agitation and injection of political and other matters wholly foreign to the merits of the treaty, we now find, strange to say, the House of Representatives, by means of a purely legislative measure, undertaking to exercise the most vital and important part of the treaty-making power of the Government.

On the horrible treaty situation which politics and personalities have created I wish to read a few lines from two or three very distinguished gentlemen. They relate to a situation as it now exists and as the House is now undertaking further to develop it, and that is to add another political step in the efforts extending over 10 months to discredit the President in the performance of his treaty-making functions and duties. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A noted French writer a short time ago made this statement:

> What has come about is the destruction of all confidence in the capacity of American plenipotentiaries to negotiate.
> In five or six years, when an American President offers us a treaty on any subject whatever, we shall reply to him, "No; thanks. What can you give us in the way of guaranties that your Senate will ratify? Bring us first the consent of the Senate. Then we will talk."
> The Republicans do not appear to understand that in discrediting Wilson as a negotiator of treaties, they at the same time discredit for three generations future Presidents of the United States who try to negotiate treaties.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

On the 4th day of February, 1899, Senator Edward O. Wolcott (Republican), of Colorado, replying to the threatened attitude of certain Democrats who were undertaking to raise foreign issues on the then pending Spanish treaty, used this language:

> For one, I believe that issue a fair one, and I am ready, as all good citizens ought to be, to meet the views of the whole American people upon the question of the conduct of the war, of its achievements, and of the policy this country should pursue at its close. But it is deplorable, Mr. President, that in formulating such an issue and in pursuit of such a policy those leaders should find it necessary to seek to dishonor this Government and the administration which has guided us so wisely through the troubled sea of international complications and brought us to the threshold of an honorable peace; that they should seek to degrade us in the face of the nations of the world; and that they should attempt to bring about some fancied political advantage by an effort to defeat the ratification of a treaty which, if unratified, must bring back a condition of war as it existed before the report of the commissioners, passive it may be, Mr. President, but full of uncertainty and full of disaster to the interest and the welfare of our country.
> For my part, I do not believe these tactics can win. There are on both sides of this Chamber enough men animated with high patriotism ready to obliterate party lines and to stand shoulder to shoulder together and with the Government, not because it is a Republican Government but because it is an American Government.

Mr. Speaker, this language applies in its every word, syllable, and letter to the conditions brought about by the present Republican Congress and now existing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Senator John Sherman on February 25, 1863, must have had just such a partisan Congress as the Sixty-sixth in mind when he said:

> We do no good to our cause, no good to our country, by constant crimination of the President, by arraigning him here, as I have heard him arraigned, as a tyrant and an imbecile. * * * If we allow his authority to be subdued and overrun we destroy the authority of the Government of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been said that this treaty is killed, and that it was killed by its friends. I want to say in reply to that that arson and murder are never committed by the real friends of the victim; they are always committed either by an avowed enemy or a pretended friend, and I dare say that those who offer criticism of the administration in connection with these treaty negotiations and the treaty delay will find difficulty in convincing the American people that the true and real friends of this treaty are responsible for whatever injury has been suffered thus far from the failure to bring about peace. Now, coming down to the present proposal. I agree that if this resolution had stopped with sections 1 and 2 you would have been on much stronger ground than you are. I agree that after the cessation of hostilities, to which the President referred in the statement often quoted in this debate, it is within the power of the legislative branch, speaking for itself, to say that so far as it is concerned "we have quit fighting." The war, that is, hostilities, has ceased, in so far as "we are concerned." That is the expression of one will, but this resolution does not stop there. It undertakes to couple section 3 as an integral and component part of sections 1 and 2. Section 3 in particular puts this House in the attitude, by a mere legislative act, of calling on the German Government to agree to a large number of things, such as Senator KNOX wrote in his recent resolution, after which this resolution is patterned. The Knox resolution expresses some of the numerous agreements to which Germany is expected through this statutory proceeding to comply. His resolution says this:

> That unless the German Government notifies the Government of the United States that it acquiesces in and confirms irrevocably to the United States all undertakings and covenants contained in the treaty of Versailles conferring upon or assuring to the United States or its nationals any rights, powers, or benefits whatsoever, and concedes to the United States all rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, and advantages to which the United States would have been entitled if it were a ratifying party to the said treaty, the President of the United States shall have power, by proclamation, to prohibit commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany and the making of loans or credits, and the furnishing of financial assistance or supplies to the German Government, or the inhabitants of Germany, directly or indirectly, by the Government of the United States or the inhabitants of the United States.

Now, for failure to agree to most of these many proposals the pending resolution says we shall sever commercial relations with Germany. I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is not the remotest shadow of even a fleeting doubt that the terms of sections 1, 2, and 3, which must be taken together, embrace an outright general treaty proposition in every possible essential. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No man can go before any court or any fair-minded tribunal and seriously argue otherwise.

While section 3 ostensibly and pretendedly proposes as its chief purpose the establishment of reciprocal trade relations with Germany, a fair construction of this section reveals its real and decidedly paramount purpose as an endeavor to have the German Government agree to assure to the United States and its nationals all the benefits and advantages which the President and the allied nations had compelled the German Government to write into the treaty of Versailles. The reciprocal trade proposal is not only minor and incidental, but, suggested in this manner, it stands out as the merest sham and pretense. The real compelling meaning and intent of section 3 is under a puny, puerile, silly threat to require the German Government, as stated, to agree in substance and in effect, although the language of the resolution is in negative form, to many of the innumerable covenants, contracts, understandings, and arrangements securing the treaty rights, privileges, benefits, penalties, indemnities, and so forth, to the United States from the German Government, as negotiated and written into the treaty of Versailles. In other words, section 3, by the use of negative language, attempts to do in some measure what the language in the Knox resolution undertakes to accomplish by including "all undertakings and covenants contained in the treaty of Versailles," and so forth. It is attempted in a feeble way to bolster up the so-called reciprocal trade contention of section 3 by citing section 3 of the reciprocity provision of the McKinley tariff act of 1890, and the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States sustaining its validity. There is no easier task than that of distinguishing this and similar enactments of Congress under its exclusive legislative power to levy and collect duties and to regulate commerce with foreign nations, from the bald treaty proposal embraced in section 3 of the pending resolution.

The acts of Congress relating to reciprocal trade and the decisions of the courts construing them have never in any remote sense trenched upon the treaty-making power of the United States Government. The Constitution gives the President the power generally to negotiate commercial treaties. Congress, as a rule, must exercise its legislative power either under the authority to levy and collect duties or to regulate commerce with foreign nations in order to carry into effect such commercial treaties. Either Congress or the Executive may take the initial step, as each has done, but in so doing the Executive in the past has in no wise encroached upon the legislative action necessary, nor has Congress, on the other hand, encroached upon the treaty-making functions of the President and the Senate in this connection. The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Field against Clark dealt alone with the question of whether Congress could delegate to the President what was alleged as its legislative power to levy duties, or, rather, to put in effect by proclamation duties already conditionally imposed by Congress.

It will be noted that the conditions prescribed as a prerequisite to the issuance of such proclamation by the President was entirely within the scope and nature of reciprocal trade legislation, and in no wise sought to make as a condition the one-sided execution of an entire treaty of peace with its wholesale conditions, qualifications, contracts, and covenants, such as are contained in the German-American provisions of the treaty of Versailles. No such condition was ever written in any congressional enactment relating to reciprocal or other trade relations, but on the contrary only such condition or conditions as were germane to this subject. The Supreme Court in the case of Field against Clark, touching on this very point, used the following language concerning this class of trade statutes:

> In the judgment of the legislative branch of the Government it is often desirable if not essential for the protection of the interests of our people against the unfriendly or discriminating regulations established by foreign Governments in the interests of their people to invest the President with large discretion in matters arising out of the execution of statutes relating to trade and commerce with other nations.

These statutes, as I have been specially pointing out, have related to "trade and commerce with other nations," and until the pending resolution was offered I dare say the idea that a condition might be made a part of a reciprocal trade statute which would require a sovereign power to enter into a wholesale peace treaty with this Government—a matter wholly foreign to all such commercial statutes and decisions thereon—has never been dreamed of until now. It has never been contended that any of the long list of congressional enactments relating to reciprocal and other trade relations with foreign nations ever in any instance transferred legislative power from Congress to the President or transferred any part of the treaty-making power from the President to be exercised under the legislative power of Congress.

When considered together as they must be, sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the pending resolution constitute an outright treaty proposal such as the Constitution vests exclusively in the President with the approval of the Senate. Viewing the clearly defined treaty-making power of the President with the approval of the Senate and the purely legislative power of the two Houses of Congress, each entirely separate and distinct, as contained in the Constitution, there is no room to escape the conclusion just stated. But even if the resolution were valid the conditions which the demands of section 3 impose on Germany renders the idea of her acceptance utterly absurd.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed resolution will mean absolutely nothing when it passes the House. It will only have served the purpose intended of allowing our Republican friends to play politics and thereby endeavor to confuse, mislead, and prejudice the public mind with respect to peace and peace conditions.

Instead of hastening or facilitating real and practical peace conditions, such performances as this resolution affords only complicate and delay the kind of peace the American people are longing for and have had a right to expect during the past eight months, and which they would have received long since but for politics. When one political party in control of the legislative branch follows the fixed policy of opposing whatever is proposed by the executive branch of the Government without regard to its merits, the country can scarcely expect congressional action in the usual and orderly way and must be prepared for just such vexatious and injurious delays as we have seen in the case of the nonratification of the peace treaty.

I can scarcely conceive of a more dishonorable attitude before the world than that in which this resolution would place the United States Government and the American people. It places us in the attitude of rejecting the treaty negotiated at Versailles and signed by Germany and all our allied Governments, but at the same time demanding of the German Government that it shall comply with the terms of the treaty in so far as they bestow benefits upon the United States and its citizens. It would be impossible to express or to imagine the amazement, hatred, contempt, and ridicule with which the allied Governments and enlightened nations the world over would view our Government and our people if this resolution should be passed over the President's veto by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress and seriously transmitted to Germany by a House or Senate messenger. The name of the United States would become a hiss and a byword in every civilized country on earth. And yet this is precisely the pusillanimous proposal that would be made to Germany after deserting our allies, if the Republicans in Congress viewed this resolution seriously, which they do not. In my judgment, if all the politics contained in both ends of the Capitol Building could have been segregated and confined to the House end for as much as three hours of any day during the past eight months, the treaty of Versailles would have been ratified without destructive reservations, and peace in the fullest sense and with all its blessings and advantages would have come to the people of this and other countries long since.

Mr. Speaker, every Member of Congress and every true American citizen alike have desired peace with all that the term implies at the earliest possible date after the signing of the armistice, but to support the pending resolution, confessedly designed as the purest political buncombe, and not in any sense intended to advance the cause of peace so much as to retard and hurt it, would constitute a far higher tribute to one's politics than to one's patriotism.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, one of the things required of every Government is that it be flexible to meet the conditions of every emergency. I believe it was said of one of the former Presidents that he must be shown the law for every step he took. It was said of another President that he must be shown the law against a proposition. In view of the fact that these two propositions seem to be involved here, it seems to me that most of our discussion here from one side of the House is to show the law in favor of this resolution. On the other side it is to show the law against the resolution. Most of the arguments from the Democratic side of the House opposed to this resolution have been based upon the premise that the resolution is an invasion of the treaty-making power. It is the contention of the drafters of the resolution that it does not invade the treaty-making power. We have not been shown any law, or any rule by which it can be construed, that shows that this resolution invades the treaty-making power. That being the case, most of the citations and most of the examples cited by the Democratic side of the House here in opposition to this resolution therefore come amiss of the mark. If you take a false premise, it is an easy matter to show that the world is flat and that water will run up hill, but you can not do it if you take well-founded principles which no one can deny. The conflict of interests here now is between the domestic and internal affairs of our Government and between the foreign policy of our Government, and which one shall be given preference by the legislative branch of our Government now. Which one do we want to forward here; which one do we want to protect?

Regardless of where the blame lies and regardless of whether the President is at fault or the Senate is at fault, it must be admitted by everyone that the peace-making machinery of our Government is in a hopeless deadlock. The armistice was signed on the 11th day of November, 1918, nearly 17 months ago; and while the treaty of peace between the Imperial German Government and the United States was signed at Versailles on June 28, 1919, it has not been ratified, and has been returned to the President and the usual method of terminating a war status has completely failed. It is certainly not within the meaning and intent of the Constitution that when Congress declares a war the only method of stopping a war is through a treaty negotiated in the regular way. If this be the case, a deadlock between the President and the Senate could keep us in war for an indefinite length of time, and although the House might withdraw support by means of refusing to pass appropriations, this would not relieve us of an internal condition of war. It is not hard to perceive conditions under which the present deadlock of a peace treaty could continue for a period of some unlimited time, and should a President and a Senate be elected of opposing parties and of adverse views on a war policy it might be possible to hold the matter up for at least a term of four years and possibly longer. For one, I am not ready to admit that when Congress once declares war no right exists to end the same except through the Executive treaty-making power, for, if this be true, the Executive of the country could keep us in war indefinitely without our approval or consent and against the will of the great majority of our people.

During the war our industries were concentrated on a war basis by duly authorized acts of Congress; unnecessary industries were eliminated and rules and regulations adopted intended to conserve our material, our munitions, and so forth, for war purposes. By reason of the war ending and the cessation of hostilities, the necessity for this condition has been entirely removed and necessity exists now for industries to return to their prewar peace basis. When the war made large demands upon industries and when every industry could dispose of twice the amount of its product that it could produce, it was an easy matter for industries to survive; but when the war ceases and our industries must return to a normal basis, when our foreign exports will begin to decrease, when our foreign imports will commence to increase, we find that, in order to protect our industries and our workmen, it is necessary that many of the rules and regulations now existing, under which they are compelled to transact their business, must be repealed. In case this is not brought about at an early date many industries will sooner or later face insolvency, many workmen will be thrown out of employment, and in many cases wages will have to be adjusted to new conditions, and our commercial life will be at such a nervous tension that unless relief is given in ample time panic conditions will endure, and instead of bringing this adjustment about gradually it will be brought about through a panic, disastrous in every way.

For the above reason I am thoroughly convinced that the repeal of the present war-time legislation will do more to relieve the present unrest, to relieve the tension under which men are working, to convince men that they should resume their prewar employment, and to discourage extravagance than any other possible act that this House can favorably consider at the present session.

The present unrest is due to many causes, among which we find the demand for short hours of labor, thereby cutting down the amount of production; the contention between the farm and city labor, the drifting of farm labor to the city by reason of attractive wages and shorter hours; favors gained by one class of laborers but not secured by another; the curtailment of production in many lines on account of the reasons heretofore given; the lust for idleness, brought about by war conditions; the inflation of the present monetary standard wherein one dollar is only worth about one-half its former value in purchasing power; the unprecedented demand for labor in every line of work, thereby creating a false standard of wage earnings; the fact that the Old World has been demanding American produce while it was fighting out its battles; and many other conditions which show to us that with the resumption of commercial relations with foreign countries we must be abreast in production and financiering in order to hold our own in the coming after-war tide which is sure to follow from foreign competitors at an early date.

Secondly, I want to call your attention to the provisions of the resolution:

Article 1 declares that the state of war, heretofore found to exist, has ended. There seems to be a great deal of confusion that a war can not end except by a treaty of peace, while the best authorities all agree that there are at least three ways by which a war may end, as follows:

> Belligerents may (1) abstain from further acts of war and glide into peaceful relations without expressly making peace through a special treaty; or (2) belligerents may formally establish the condition of peace through a special treaty; or (3) a belligerent may end the war through subjugation of his adversary. (Oppenheim, International Law, vol. 2, p. 322.)
> There are three ways of terminating hostilities between States, namely, (1) by a mere cessation of hostilities of both sides, without any definite understanding supervening; (2) by the conquest and subjugation of one of the contending parties by the other so that the former is reduced to impotence and submission; (3) by a mutual arrangement embodied in a treaty of peace whether the honors of war be equal or unequal.
> Under the first mode the relationships between the parties remain in a condition of uncertainty, and, owing to the numerous difficulties involved, combatant States have very seldom resorted to this method of withdrawing from the war without arriving at some definite and intelligible decision. (Phillipson, Termination of War and Treaties of Peace, p. 3.)
> It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances. (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, July 22, 1868, Dip. Cor., 1868, vol. 2, pp. 32 to 34, cited Moore's International Law, vol. 7, p. 336.)

Section 2 provides for the repeal of the present war-time legislation, and among the acts which would be repealed by this section, should it be enacted into law, are found the following: The trading-with-the-enemy act, the alien custodian act, the espionage act, the draft law, the Overman Act, and the Lever pure-food act. Each and every one of these measures would be repealed should this resolution be enacted into a law. These laws are responsible for a great deal of the unrest which exists in our country at the present time, especially in the condensed centers thereof. I do not believe that anyone here thinks that they should be continued for an additional length of time. There are many other laws the repeal of which will be brought about by section 2, but I mention these solely for the purpose of showing that the more drastic measures which lead to a great deal of the unrest would be immediately affected by the passage of this resolution. This resolution would have the same effect on this legislation as the ratification of the treaty by the Senate and the proclamation of peace by the President.

Section 3 of the bill provides for the restoration of reciprocal trade relations with the German Government and retains to our citizens and to our country all rights preserved to them under the treaty of Versailles.

Section 4 is merely a penalty section for section 3.

Section 5 reserves to us all of the rights, privileges, indemnities, and advantages to which we are entitled under the terms of the armistice or acquired in any other way by reason of our participation in the war.

Third. Authorities and precedents supporting this resolution.

Reference has heretofore been made that there are other ways of ending war than making a treaty of peace. A great deal of confusion has arisen for the reason that many confuse a resolution declaring that a state of war no longer exists with a treaty of peace ending war. This resolution in sections 1, 2, and 5 deals purely with domestic matters and has no reference whatsoever to our relations with other countries. It declares that a satisfactory condition exists in this country and this resolution can be used as a basis for the President in negotiating a further treaty of peace.

It has been held in numerous cases that the House may pass a resolution terminating, enforcing, and suggesting treaties. (1502–1520, Hinds' Precedents, vol. 2, p. 975.) See sections 1504, 1505, 1514, 1520, Hallock's International Law, volume 1, page 334, which says:

> Every treaty of peace is nothing more than a compromise.

See also same volume, page 330:

> By the Constitution of the United States of America the President has the exclusive power of making treaties of peace which, when ratified with the advice and consent of the Senate, become the supreme law of the land, and have the effect of repealing all other laws of Congress as of its States which stand in the way of their stipulations.
> But Congress may at any time compel the President to make peace by refusing the means of carrying on the war, and its approbation is necessary for the passage of any laws which might be required for carrying into effect the stipulations of the treaty.

When we authorized the President to prosecute the war, did we authorize him to continue the prosecution until the war ended, or until the nations involved formulated themselves into an international supergovernment according to his particular views, and did we imply therein a right to enforce all war legislation on the peoples of the country until the peoples of this country acquiesced in his demands? President Wilson did not bring back a treaty of peace to end war; he brought back the covenants of a League of Nations, with the peace treaty an adjunct thereto. Must we sit in silence with the peace machinery of our Government locked? Must this Government of ours sit still until a referendum is had fixing the blame and suggesting the remedy before a remedy can be had? Must we admit that in this situation our Government is unable to function and that present conditions must continue until relief is found through the same channels that have failed since November 11, 1918?

By this resolution we are placing the legal machinery of our Government in a position to await the coming of a treaty of peace at some future date. We are restoring our commercial and industrial life as near to a peace basis as possible under existing conditions. We are holding our international and domestic rights in status quo awaiting further negotiations. A government that can not meet an emergency is not flexible; a government that fails in an important function is doomed. Our Government must not fail and it can not delay longer. This resolution is not an attempt to make peace with Germany, but a resolution declaring that this country, so far as we are concerned, considers the war at an end and that peace conditions shall be restored. I do not favor permitting the President to legislate us into a League of Nations, under the guise of a peace treaty, without the consent of the legislative branch of our Government, and this resolution simply declares the condition that shall exist in our country until the matter is finally determined by treaty. And yet when we present this resolution for this purpose, and for this purpose only, when this honest and conscientious effort is made to protect American rights and further our privileges as American citizens, we are met by the ferocious howl of the administration supporters that some one is trying to discredit the President. If we must discredit the President in order to protect the rights of our citizens, I for one am willing to vote "aye."

PRESUMPTION AS TO VALIDITY.

[From Federal Statutes Annotated, vol. 10, p. 392.]

The presumption is in favor of the validity of an act of Congress, and it is only when the question is free from any reasonable doubt that the court should hold an act of the law-making power of the Nation to be in violation of that fundamental instrument upon which all the powers of the Government rest. The provisions of an act should not be lightly or inadvisedly set aside, although if they be plainly antagonistic to the Constitution it is the duty of the court to so declare.

Congress has power to abrogate a treaty made by the President and approved by the Senate.

NEED OF LEGISLATURE TO GIVE EFFECT TO TREATIES.

Yet, although the power is given to the Executive, with the consent of the Senate, to make treaties, the power is nowhere in positive terms conferred upon Congress to make laws to carry the stipulations of treaties into effect. It has been supposed to result from the duty of the National Government to fulfill all the obligations of treaties.

No power is given to the President and the Senate to effectuate the terms of the treaty by legislation. On the other hand, power is given to Congress by law to carry into execution all the powers vested in other departments of which the treaty-making power is one. Can the conclusion be reached that the law-making department must then concur in action with the treaty-making power to make the treaty effectual as law to the people? Can an inference in favor of Executive authority be admissible in the face of this expressed delegation of power to Congress to carry the treaty into execution? Can it be held that it is obligatory upon Congress to do all of this—not discretionary—and that Congress must register the will of the President and Senate without power to dissent?

IMPLIED POWERS TO FULFILL TREATIES.

To this end it was needful only to make express grants of general powers, coupled with a further grant of such incidental and auxiliary powers as might be required for the exercise of the powers expressly granted. These powers are necessarily extensive. It has been found, indeed, in the practical administration of the Government that a very large part, if not the largest part, of its functions have been performed in the exercise of powers thus implied. (Hepburn v. Griswald, 8 Wall., 613; 19 W. C., 513.)

CONCLUSION.

In my judgment, it is imperative that the American people, that American industries and American commerce, be relieved from the present handicap of war legislation. There is no other method by which this relief can be brought about at this time except by action of this House. Our Government must not cease to function in an emergency, even though the treaty-making power is blocked by reason of a disagreement between the Executive and one branch of the legislative department. The United States is made up of a great people, all of whom know of the freedom and opportunities of the American citizenship. The founders of this Republic had sense enough to make up a Constitution which experience has shown to be a wonderful document. When we realize that the United States, with 6 per cent of the population and 7 per cent of the land of the world, produces 20 per cent of its gold, 25 per cent of its wheat, 40 per cent of its iron, 50 per cent of its coal, 60 per cent of its copper, 65 per cent of its oil, 75 per cent of its corn, 85 per cent of the automobiles, and has 40 per cent of all the railroads, we then comprehend what a marvelous achievement has been worked out under the American Constitution. As Representatives in Congress, we are here to insure the domestic tranquillity by this Constitution guaranteed; we are here to promote the general welfare of this American citizenship whose wonderful achievements I have just described. Our Government has stood the test; our citizenship speaks for its efficiency. I would say to the college professor who with knit brow hints approval of the socialism of Marx, "You are not fit to instruct our young men." I would say to the public-school teacher who says that our form of government is inferior to others, "Your resignation is acceptable." I would say to the Russian and German Bolshevist, "Get out of our country and stay out. Your teaching has no attraction for us." Let us put more Americanism into our teachings, our preachings, our congressional legislation, and restore the American citizenship to its prewar privileges and our country can not help but survive.

Who saves his country saves all things,
And all things saved do bless him;
Who lets his country die lets all things die,
And all things, dying, curse him.

[Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in the wide range of this discussion, it seems to me that one outstanding fact has not been sufficiently stressed. There has been constant reference here to the reasonable and insistent demand of the public that the prewar status should be restored as completely as possible. There has been unlimited criticism of the President and certain Senators as if they were responsible for the prewar status not being restored. But the outstanding fact that has been glossed over is that the responsibility rests directly on Congress. Except for the mere matter of the continuance of the war in a technical sense, Congress could long ago have gone far in the direction of restoring the conditions that existed prior to the war, not simply with respect to our domestic concerns, but with respect to intercourse with Germany and Austria. But Congress has utterly failed to recognize and perform its duty in that regard. It has not attempted to take up the great problems consequent on the war for the purpose of considering and disposing of them in a systematic and comprehensive manner. It has made no attempt to deal in any such manner with the mass of laws, some of them expressed in statutes and some otherwise expressed, which it was necessary to maintain in effect while the war was flagrant, but which it was not necessary to maintain after hostilities ceased without any prospect of hostilities being resumed. Now and then an individual statute has been dealt with and repealed or amended, as, for instance, the railroad-control act and the war-time prohibition act, but I repeat that there has been an utter absence of any general or coherent policy relative to the modification of the war laws or relative to any of the great problems which the war has created. Up to this time we have observed a policy, if it can be called a policy, of indifference and drift, with really nothing done in response to the continuous and crying demand of the public. Since the extra session began on May 19, 1919, nearly a year ago, there has not been a day or hour when Congress was not entirely free to undertake a survey and analysis of the entire body of the war laws—and not confining itself to the statutes enacted since April 6, 1917—with a view to such action touching the individual laws as would place our domestic affairs and our relations with the enemy nations on a practical and substantial basis. This could have been done. It ought to have been done last year. If it had been heretofore intelligently done, there would be left now only a bare technical state of war, with a minimum of embarrassment to this country and the enemy countries. But there has been an utter failure to do it.

What a contrast is afforded by the action of England. Before the ink was dry upon the terms written in the armistice England had gotten busy on the very line on which we are only beginning to travel here. Parliament deliberately acted before the expiration of November, 1918. Here the thing that might have been done has been left undone, and now the House is expected to do something which it ought not to do by passing a hastily conceived and hastily debated resolution without the opportunity of making any change, however slight. It is charged that the President was averse to the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" in the treaty of peace, and we are now invited to the same course here in respect to this important resolution. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It might have been expected that such a resolution, if believed to have merit and desired to become a law, would have originated in the Senate, which has done hardly anything else for several months but talk about the questions that the resolution involves, but the Senate is evidently willing to try it out on the House and let the House bear the humiliation incident to giving its approval to a resolution which hereafter will be regarded as absurd. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Section 2 is undeniably within the power of Congress. It is a blanket provision which attempts to modify the war statutes enacted since April 6, 1917. It is confined to those statutes, but those statutes are so framed that to many of them it can have no application. Its practical effect from an economic and business point of view upon those to which it does apply would require such study and analysis of the individual statutes as the Committee on Foreign Affairs has not made, and I doubt whether any Member of this House has made. The section is a long-delayed and feeble and a rather reckless effort to meet the public demand that prewar conditions be restored, a demand with which I am in complete sympathy. Nevertheless, while it is open to much criticism, in my anxiety to meet that just demand I would vote for the section if it could be detached from portions of the resolution which I find myself unable to support. Whether the resolution is enacted or not, and, though a motion to recommit should be defeated, I suggest that the Judiciary Committee should be directed to analyze the existing statutes passed since April 6, 1917, and the war laws outside of the scope of those statutes and report any bills which may be thought necessary for the purpose of bringing about a return to prewar conditions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me say a word or two about other sections of the resolution. It has been assumed that the intention of the first section is to establish, by the declaration which it contains, complete peace in every sense, substantially and technically. I agree with those who have argued against that being within the power of Congress. Their argument has sufficiently developed the reasons supporting that view. They have been pointed out, or at least could have been pointed out, that if Congress can do what it is assumed the first section proposes, it can take such action at any stage of any war as well before as after an armistice is signed, and it can take such action at any moment after hostilities have ceased, even though at that very moment a treaty of peace is on the point of being ratified. I do not care to refer to any of the authorities that have been cited or to any additional extracts except Senator LODGE's essay on the treaty-making powers of the Senate, published in 1902, in which, discussing the treaty-making clause, he commends as the best description of the manner in which it was modified, after being reported by the committee on detail, the statement of George Ticknor Curtis. Senator LODGE quotes a part of Mr. Curtis's statement, and the part quoted contains the following:

> The power to declare war having been vested in the whole legislature, it was necessary to provide the mode in which a war was to be terminated. As the President was to be the organ of communication with other governments, and as he would be the chief guardian of the national interests, the negotiation of a treaty of peace and of all other treaties was necessarily confided to him. But as treaties would not only involve the general interests of the Nation and might touch the particular interests of individual States, and whatever their effect, were to be a part of the supreme law of the land, it was necessary to give to the Senators, as the direct representatives of States, a concurrent authority with the President over the relations to be affected by them.

And then follows a statement of the considerations that led to the requirement that in the Senate the representatives of more than a bare majority of the States should concur.

But I shall not take the line that has been pursued. I shall not assume that the intention of the first section is to do more than declare that the war is at an end in the sense that actual hostilities have ceased and are not likely to be resumed, and in no other sense. I feel confident that should the resolution become a law, and two parties to a very important contract, fixing duties and rights contingent upon the termination of the war, submit to a court a controversy as to the construction of the first section, the court would have no difficulty in deciding that to be its meaning. Not only does the resolution in other sections refer to an armistice, that is to say, a truce being still in effect the terms of which are not to be waived, and also refer to the war as a "present war," but the preamble of the resolution, which is to be regarded in a way as its basis, cites a statement by the President that the war is ended, which statement Congress itself and the Supreme Court, in deciding the prohibition cases, have viewed as nothing more than an assertion that hostilities are at an end. I have no doubt whatever that the court in such a case as I have supposed, construing the contract, would hold that section 1 was not intended to terminate and can not operate to terminate the war in a strict technical sense. That being the situation, section 1 may perhaps be laid aside as relatively unimportant.

Section 3 is the objectional provision. It is nothing more or less than, in substance, an attempt to agree and adopt a treaty of peace with Germany, which is to be the very treaty heretofore negotiated, in so far as it concerns the obligations which that treaty imposes on Germany. Incidentally, it may be noted, though it is not very important to note, that any obligations which that treaty may impose on the United States are not to be regarded or preserved. If Congress can, under a statute or resolution, adjust the relations between the United States and an enemy nation in this instance, it can, of course, do so in any instance and exercise the treaty-making authority, although the President and Senate would certainly be entitled to function independently along parallel lines. In other words, under a resolution passed by a majority vote of the two Houses of Congress, and not disapproved by the President, a treaty might be secured through the agency of anyone named in the resolution, and at the same moment the President might negotiate another and different treaty, which is, to my mind, inconceivable. Should it be replied that section 3 does not ignore the President as the treaty-making agent of the Government, but expressly recognizes him as such by placing on him the duty of ascertaining what, if any, agreement—and an agreement is a treaty—Germany is willing to make, the same to be accepted if within the terms of section 3, a singular situation is presented, namely, that while the Constitution leaves the matter of negotiating and agreeing on a treaty to the President, Congress intervenes to instruct the President how the negotiation shall be carried on and what the thing resulting from it shall be. This is also, to my mind, inconceivable, and therefore I must oppose the resolution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Congress, House joint resolution 327, now under consideration, proposes to make a separate peace with Germany. Such a proposal is without constitutional warrant and without precedent. In the opinion of the Chief Executive, concurred in by the State Department, who are in possession of all the authorities, all the precedents, all the laws and expert information on the subject, and who are actually charged with the duty of promulgating treaties, are of the opinion that it is a nullity, without effect; that it will not close the war; that it will but confuse, retard, and hinder and delay the bringing about of peace, which the Nation yearns for and desires.

I shall not reiterate the many able legal arguments that have been made, every one of them confirmatory and conclusive of the fact that peace can not be made by the passage of such a resolution. I shall not recite the terms of the Constitution which specifically empower the President to make peace treaties, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate. I shall not reiterate the fact that the fathers in the Constitutional Convention by unanimous vote refused to give the Congress the powers that they this day for the first time seek to employ. To do this would be repeating in poor fashion what has already been presented in good fashion.

I shall content myself with the thought that even if the Congress had the power to do the thing this resolution purports to do—to make a separate peace with Germany—it would be as unwise as it is dangerous. It would be making a separate, haggling peace with not only our own enemy but the enemy of civilization; it would be allying ourselves with our enemy at the expense and sacrifice of every one of the 45 nations who have just signed the peace treaty and with whom our friendship has been entwined and interlinked. If the passage of such a resolution meant any achievement toward a lasting peace we would embrace it together, but to make peace with Germany and leave a long shadow and trail of animosity behind to the 45 nations of the earth that have already signed the treaty would be playing fast and loose with America's honor—would to me be a course of disaster and a pitiable surrender of the best ideals of our Nation.

What answer shall we make for such a course to the fathers and mothers of the 50,000 American boys who were killed on the battle fields of France? What answer shall we make to those who fought and fell that free government might live, that Prussianism might be crushed, and the nations of the earth might dwell in peace together? What answer shall history make for us who this day attempt such a course? To me the passage of such a resolution is saying to Germany, "Although you sought to crush civilization and caused the nations of the earth to lose 7,500,000 lives and expend $187,000,000,000"—by a simple wave of the hand we answer, "We have done; we have concluded; you may go."

What answer shall we make to the taxpayers of the Republic who spent $30,000,000,000 in war activities and loans that free government might live? Is the passage of a simple resolution like this one, which merely declares the war as ended, without retribution, without settlement, without achievement? Will that suffice; is that all a grateful Republic may expect? Is that all we as their agents will exact of Germany for the terrible toll exacted of us, of the sacrifices made?

What answer shall we make to the Nation, who now holds $500,000,000 worth of alien enemy property, seized under the authority of this Congress from the German Government and her nationals to be used in partially indemnifying Americans for their loss of property and the havoc that has been wrought? Shall all this go for naught, be sacrificed, given back, ended by the passage of such a resolution?

What answer shall we make to American claimants who hold claims aggregating a billion dollars against Germany for the sinking of ships, murdering of free-born Americans, loss of cargo, until the very bottom of the sea is strewn with sunken ships, with wasted cargo, with America's dead?

Will the passage of this simple resolution reciting "the war is ended"—will that answer, will that satisfy, is that all we have to offer?

Will the five years of Prussian outlawry and outrages against not only our own civilization but the civilization of the world be thus condoned, thus forgiven, thus forgotten?

Shall we as a Nation surrender our standing, our prestige, our leadership, and turn traitor to those with whom we have just fought simply to make an abortive effort to make a separate peace with Germany, when Germany is entitled to no separate negotiations or special favors from us?

Can a thoughtful constituency, who believe in free government and who despise autocratic government, counsel such a course, point such a way, approve of such a plan?

No. To me our duty as a House of Representatives seems clear—that we should attend to our own business; revise the tax laws, that are burdensome and heavy to bear; pass soldier legislation, that is needed, clamored for, promised, and deserved; reduce the high cost of living; encourage agriculture; repeal the burdensome war laws, that are irksome and hard to endure; get back to normal conditions; stand on our own bottom; observe our own Constitution; perform our duties that are within our jurisdiction and not inject ourselves into a controversy between the Executive and the Senate, whose duties are prescribed by the Constitution and whose delinquencies will be dealt with by the American people. [Applause.]

To me the duty of this House seems clear—that the passage of such a resolution as the one proposed would not bring peace; it would not end the war; it would not settle anything. It is but a makeshift. It is but a pretense. It is a thing unreal; a thing without warrant of law, Constitution, good morals, or good sense.

To me it seems perfectly clear that peace must be made by the parties who were engaged in the war. One party to the contract can not make the peace. The terms must be agreed upon. The common-sense thing to do is to stand with our associates and make the peace they make. If we refuse to make the peace they make, instead of having the bulk of the world with us we have the bulk of the world against us. The passage of such a resolution will not beget the friendship of Germany but it will beget the enmity of the 45 nations who have signed the treaty and who will all be against us. To abandon the peace treaty and the covenant now would be disastrous, for our Monroe doctrine will be shattered and gone, because the South and Central American nations have signed the treaty and are all going into the league.

To me it seems perfectly clear that to thus abandon the nations with whom we have just fought is to make our folly of the moment the folly of the age.

To me it is perfectly clear that the time will soon come and at no distant date when the President of the United States and the Senate will each do its part in getting together on a treaty and with such interpretations as do not mutilate and destroy but that do make it perfectly clear that we do not sacrifice an American right, and that we will still do our part as a Nation, and that we will stand with our associates; that we will end the war; and that we will stand for, first, arbitration; second, reduction of armament; third, the abolition of secret treaties—all vouchsafed to us in the peace treaty and in the covenant. To such a course all Americans may well subscribe. A course of surrender in the making of a separate and haggling peace with our enemy is a course that Americans may well avoid, and we as their representatives may well avoid for them.

Let me pause to remind them that the defeat of the peace treaty defeats arbitration, and arbitration has been the hope of civilization for 2,000 years.

Let me pause to remind that the defeat of the peace treaty by the 96 Senators of the United States is the defeat of the provision for the reduction of armament, which has been the hope of the Republic from its inception to this good day.

Let me pause to remind that the defeat and the abandonment of the peace treaty and the covenant is the abandonment of hope for the abolition of secret treaties, which have been the breeder of all wars from the dawn of civilization until now.

Let those who delight at the defeat of the peace treaty be reminded that we are just concluding a war where 7,500,000 lives were lost on the field of battle—more lives lost than in all the wars of history.

Let me remind them that we are just concluding a war that cost the 26 nations engaged in it $187,000,000,000, which is more than one-third of the wealth of the nations engaged in it. Let me remind them of the $30,000,000,000 gleaned from the taxpayers of our own land to conduct this war. Let me remind them of the 230,000 wounded soldiers who must of necessity hobble through life, a more or less miserable existence. Let me remind them of the mothers of the land who, throughout the long, tedious war, knit sweaters and socks, to aid as best they could to win the battle for free government and for civilization. Let me remind them of the 20,000 American girls who enlisted for war service to bind up the Nation's wounds. Let me remind them to visit the national cemeteries, both in France and America, where America's dead lie in abundance; let me remind them to visit Arlington. Let them witness the wounded and maimed—let them witness the limbless trunks, sightless eyes, with health gone. Ponder well these unsightly scenes, these costly sacrifices, before you make separate peace with Germany at the expense of our friends.

To follow such a course I can not subscribe. To such a course no thoughtful constituency will insist.

To pursue such a course would be to abandon the Constitution of the fathers, which, through long years of trial in the fiery furnace of politics and fancy, has stood every test. It has been the giant oak that has protected us in every storm both in peace and in war. It has saved and soothed the weak from the revenge of the mighty. It has blazed the way of righteousness and justice and bound together with bands of steel the rich, the poor—the high, the low—the savage and the civilized. I can not think the exigencies are so great, I can not think the hour of peril so near, as to abandon it now and trample under foot our bulwark of hope, faith, and charity, for within its costly folds it holds them all safe and secure.

No; to me such a course is unthinkable—to such a course I can not subscribe. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOUGHTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. HOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution obviously presents two questions to the House; first, is the action contemplated by the resolution constitutional and within the power of the Congress? And second, if constitutional, is it expedient? I had not, I confess, thought a discussion necessary from this latter viewpoint. It seemed to me evident that the people of the United States wanted peace, and that a deadlock between President and Senate prevented the realization of that fervent wish, and that if a constitutional way could be found to terminate the purely technical state of war in which they are involved and to free them from its restrictions it would be welcomed by all of us alike. Apparently, such is not the fact. Apparently also, if one may judge by yesterday's debate, even to discuss the possibility is a sort of lèse-majesté. If so, the risk must obviously be run. A discussion from this angle evidently ought to be made.

For five years past the people of the United States have been living in a sort of economic nightmare. They have had unprecedented material prosperity, and it has satisfied nobody. They have been taxed under a system which enabled them to pay dividends on their taxes. Their dollars have multiplied marvelously, and yet somehow in the process they became 50-cent pieces. Is it any wonder that some of us, under the influence of such bewildering phenomena, began to fear that human society had entered upon a new phase, wherein wages and prices might be increased at will until in the end everything would be so high that none of us could buy anything, and the race would perish in the midst of plenty? Fortunately we did not reach that point. But it has been an extraordinary period and the fundamental explanation is simple. The war had been under way only a few months when it became apparent that, with the rest of the world at loggerheads, the need of our foodstuffs and raw material and manufactured goods was practically unlimited. Unlimited demand, however, means the end of competition. And from that time until the end of 1919, with competition practically suspended, we have seen prices soaring, industry expanding by leaps and bounds, wages doubling and even tripling, exaggerated profits, speculation running wild, and everywhere industrial and social unrest.

When the time came for America to participate in the war we withdrew from this already strained situation some 4,000,000 men who, previously engaged in production, now became, economically speaking, mere consumers. That left a shortage of labor so acute that the Government was forced to take in hand the job of making over the whole machinery of production, and this it did by taking men from nonessential industries and putting them in industries that were essential to supply the war demands. Even when hostilities ceased that desperate demand continued and production rang along unslackened. But recently a change has taken place. It has only begun, but its meaning is unmistakable. If, for instance, we compare the country's total production for 1919 with that of 1918 we find a decrease. Such comparisons are difficult to make with any accuracy. But the decrease may safely be estimated as approaching 20 per cent. That trend is maintaining its downward course in the present year. Other items, of course, tend to accentuate the movement. The Government is making no more loans to foreign Governments to be used in buying our products. The fact that substantially no new freight cars have been built in the past couple of years is making itself felt. Wherever you turn you find labor slightly more plentiful—you find reserve orders for materials somewhat lessened. Economic laws are beginning to assert themselves. Competition is no longer wholly negligible. A widespread feeling of caution is manifesting itself in all directions. It begins, indeed, in all truth, to look as if the time was at hand when the eggs must be unscrambled. The process bids fair to be a long and somewhat painful one.

Now, one man's guess is as good as another's as to the duration and the severity of the unscrambling process through which the country inevitably must pass. We would probably all agree that it will be serious enough. There is no apparent reason why we should seek to intensify it. And yet, as I see it, we are making a situation distinctly worse by permitting a technical state of war to continue. We need the greatest freedom of action. The Government can not help. We must do the job ourselves. All the readjustments of industry, all the infinitely complex mass of relations of supply and demand, which boards and commissions and inspectors, and God knows what else, have been regulating and controlling and directing, must be left to the American people—to them, as individuals—if this Nation is again to enter into safe and stable economic conditions. [Applause.]

We are talking here as if this freedom of relief from war conditions was a purely academic thing, as a more or less interesting point of constitutional law. It is vastly more, for it involves intimately the well-being of more than a hundred million Americans. Other factors, of course, enter in. The situation is a complex one at best. But there are two outstanding facts, both springing from the war situation, which are working directly to our detriment. If possible, both, it seems to me, should be eliminated.

First, the President still possesses the extraordinary powers of regulation and control of industry which Congress gave him three years ago to further the prosecution of the war. It is unnecessary to discuss this in detail. The emergency for which those powers were given has clearly passed. Such powers, invading as they do the private rights and freedom of every citizen, should never be intrusted to any man one moment after the absolute need for them has ceased. They weaken our morale. They tend to break down our reliance upon the ordinary processes of law. They can be used plausibly in some minor emergency on behalf of some of us and against the rest of us. What I want to emphasize here, however, is their destructive effect upon industry. They check and hamper enterprise by making men overcautious. They paralyze initiative. They menace the future. They make our difficult task more difficult. That these powers are not actually employed at any one time is immaterial. They exist, nevertheless. And if we are prudent men, these powers should be repealed.

Second, we are geared up as a Nation, as you know, to produce a good bit more than we can consume. And upon our ability to export part or all of this surplus product our immediate future depends. Otherwise overproduction begins. Here again figures are hard to obtain. But it is probably safe to assume that we have been exporting recently about 10 per cent of our total production. It is safe to assume also that unless we take steps to safeguard the future, those exports will be sharply curtailed. As matters stand, merely because technically we are still at war, we are substantially barred out of one, at least, of the great potential markets of the world. Our people can not trade with the peoples of central Europe except by license, except as they work under the restriction and difficulties of the trading-with-the-enemy act. England can. France can. Italy and Japan can. And they do. They are very properly taking advantage of every opening to build up and extend their commerce in those countries. We can not. This great potential market is shut to us. A great industrial opportunity is being sacrificed.

But that is not all. We hear every now and then about "voices in the air," and about our obligations to other nations. It is, of course, the simple and obvious and unexaggerated truth that civilization depends upon the restoration throughout the world of normal conditions of production and trade. Why, then, make the task more difficult? The one prime requisite is to get men to work—to get materials to them, where necessary, to enable them to work. This assistance the Government can not wisely and effectively render. To be effective, it must be given by individual to individual, not as a charity but as a loan, in the common everyday routine of commercial intercourse. In no other way can individual initiative and responsibility and effort be assured—nor can this help be placed in the hands of those who are most capable of using it. Congress has recognized this fact by passing the Edge bill, which enables our banks to engage in this work. A start has been made. It is but slight. But the work could go forward much more rapidly if permitted to expand freely. Obviously if we permit technical obstacles to block the way, we simply delay to that extent this free interplay of economic forces upon whose action the fate of this war-ravaged world to-day undoubtedly depends. Everybody knows that. Everybody knows how vital it is that the upbuilding process should begin. And yet the entire emphasis of the discussion by our friends across the aisle is not how to further the process but why we must block it. Men are dying and women and little children are starving because the assistance America can and would give is barred. It makes me wonder if there is not a place somewhere in this discussion for a little business sense?

Two questions, as I said, are presented by the resolution—is the action contemplated by it constitutional, and if constitutional should the resolution be adopted? I do not pretend to discuss the constitutional question, although I am free to say I see no way in which the action contemplated by the resolution conflicts with the treaty-making rights and powers of the President. But there is no doubt in my mind that the plain people of the United States want the resolution passed. They want peace. They want the right to work out their economic salvation in their own way and without hindrance or interference by the Government. And they know why. Both have been denied them. A constitutional deadlock exists. Naturally and as is their right they turn to the Congress for relief. The resolution before you represents an honest effort, constitutionally, to meet their clearly expressed demand. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am not vain enough to believe that anything that I could say or that anybody else could say will defeat this resolution. If Alexander Hamilton and John Jay and James Madison and all the great men that participated in making the Constitution of the United States were to walk in here, headed by the majestic shade of Washington and flanked by John Marshall, the greatest jurist that ever construed it, and explain that you are acting absurdly, it would not make a dent upon the Republican majority in this House. [Laughter and applause.] The ukase of that remarkable aggregation of talents known as the steering committee has issued its mandate to pass this resolution through this House.

I am not going to waste any time in this speech about the League of Nations or the quarrel in the Senate, or any of that kind of stuff. I am going to express my own opinion very briefly. If I had acted according to my own feeling I would simply have taken it out in voting, because I know the futility of speechmaking. Since God issued his fiat, "Let there be light," the wisest set of men who ever sat under one roof in this world were the men who made the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] They wrote a document that is the only paper Constitution that has ever passed the century mark in its life, a document that has received the unstinted admiration and the frequently declared concurrence of the entire civilized world. Wherever men have been struggling for free government or liberty the Constitution of the United States has been taken as the model.

The wisest thing the fathers did was to divide the powers of government and distribute them among three separate and distinct departments, the legislative, the judicial, and the executive. It is this nice balance of powers among these three departments that has kept this Republic alive and has made this Government a great and profound success. [Applause.] In the distribution of the powers of government, the Constitution makers devolved upon the executive department the conduct of our foreign affairs, all of them.

There was a long dispute about who had the right to recognize foreign Governments. It was joggled about, first and last, and finally President Cleveland put an absolute end to it by writing a document stating that the Constitution gave foreign affairs into the hands of the President, and Congress had no business fooling with it; and from that day to this that has been accepted as final on that proposition. My own opinion is—and it is a settled conviction after a great deal of study—that each one of these three departments should attend strictly and exclusively to its own business [applause] and not undertake to encroach upon the powers of the others. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In applauding that statement you Republicans acted with more sense than usual. [Laughter and applause.] Of course, people that know the history of this country know that sometimes the Executive absorbs more power than he is entitled to. [Applause on the Republican side.] It began with Gen. Grant [laughter on the Democratic side] on account of his vast personal popularity. Some others have practiced it. [Laughter.] Sometimes Congress has encroached upon the powers of the Executive. For instance, in the days of Andrew Johnson they reduced the Presidency almost to a nullity.

I have been consistent about this theory. I would resent, and I do resent, the judiciary legislating from the bench, and so do you men. I would resent the encroachments of the Executive upon the other branches, and I will resent the encroachment of Congress upon the undoubted prerogatives of the Executive. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There might have been some doubt about this thing—that is, about the constitutional intention—if it never had been mentioned in the constitutional convention. But it was mentioned. It was proposed to give Congress the power to make peace, and it was voted down unanimously. So believing, I will vote against this resolution, though I am as much in favor of peace as any man on earth, but this resolution will not bring peace. On the contrary, it will bring "confusion worse confounded" and involve us in all sorts of uncertainty and difficulties.

Now, some of you gentlemen over on that side may think that you have got more brains than the men who made the Constitution. I do not believe it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Here is the peculiar feature about this thing: This Porter resolution is not really a House resolution at all. It is a Senate resolution, introduced by Senator KNOX, of Pennsylvania, several months ago, revamped, and they have been afraid to bring it up there, and this performance here to-day is purely a political performance. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Constitution of the United States distinctly gives to the executive department control over our foreign affairs in making treaties, and this resolution, if it means anything, is essentially a treaty with Germany, a thing that we are prohibited from doing. Of course, you can go through the motions and you can pass it, and after you have passed it it is what the old Latins would have called a frutum fulmen, a futile thing, a useless thing, a thing that has no force or effect in the world.

Suppose it were left to you gentlemen over there to get up a treaty with Germany. Do you believe you could do it? It seems to me that so many cooks would spoil the broth. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I want to read an extract from a Republican newspaper, the biggest Republican newspaper west of the Mississippi River, and I especially commend it to my serious friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and to my flamboyant friend from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], because the Republicans of Kansas swear by the Globe-Democrat. I do not. [Laughter.] But it is the biggest Republican paper west of the Mississippi. Here is an editorial extract:

> Whatever we may say, the state of war with Germany can not be actually terminated without the acquiescence of Germany, and that acquiescence can be obtained by no one but the President.

That is Republican authority, and it is high Republican authority—

> There can be no question about the supreme authority of the President in the conduct of foreign affairs, nor of his exclusive authority to make treaties, subject only to the approval of the Senate before they can be ratified.

This certainly was not written for buncombe—

> The proposed resolution calls for an agreement with Germany and is, in effect, a treaty of peace. We do not believe that Congress has any such right, nor that its action, if it adopted the resolution, would be supported by the Supreme Court. That court has repeatedly declared that "the negotiation and modification of treaties is a prerogative of the Executive with which the courts can not interfere," and Mr. Taft, in an opinion which we quoted the other day, says that "the President is the only organ of government through which our relations with foreign Governments can be initiated or changed in the first instance.
> "No one can constitutionally communicate for the United States with another country except through the President. Only he can make an armistice, only he can sign a protocol of peace, only he can initiate a treaty, and only he can communicate its confirmation by the Senate to the nations with whom it is made. Until he does proclaim it it is not a treaty of the United States."
> How, then, can the conditions of this resolution be communicated to Germany and its acceptance obtained save through the President? Congress is constitutionally voiceless beyond our domains. If the President refuses to approve this resolution, as he certainly will, unless he chooses to surrender his constitutional authority, there is no legal way by which it may be presented to the German Government, and if not so presented it can have no force. There is much justification for the impatience of Congress, but we are confident that such a resolution as this would have no meaning without the support of the President, and would serve only to complicate further a situation that is already intolerable. All the things it seeks to accomplish are eminently desirable, but this is not the way to accomplish them.

Now, as some esthetic eastern gentleman who labors under the delusion that St. Louis is still merely an Indian trading post may not believe that the Globe-Democrat is of any avail, if such antediluvian there be, I am glad to enlarge his intelligence by a few pertinent sentences from an editorial from the Springfield (Mass.) Republican. For fear that some wild and woolly westerner may not have heard of Springfield, Mass., as the New England Brahmins would phrase it, I am delighted to inform him that it is distinguished by being the home of our honored Speaker, Hon. FREDERICK HUNTINGTON GILLETT, and incidentally the home of the Soul.

The Springfield Republican, founded by Samuel Bowles, is a very influential Republican journal of light and leading. Not long since the Republican said, editorially:

> It needs at least two to make peace. One alone can declare peace, but suppose after one side had declared peace the other side should keep on fighting. According to this novel and quaint theory of declaring peace by congressional resolution, a country getting whipped or tired of war might solemnly resolve that the war was over, but would such a resolution stop the enemy's armies in their march of invasion? Would it save your country's capital from capture? The theory of declaring peace so much discussed in Washington would necessarily proceed on that absurd assumption. The principle appealed to by the peace declarers must be squared with all possible situations under which peace has to be made, and when put to this test it immediately breaks down.

When transcendentalism was in flower in New England, a man crossing Boston Common ran across a small boy digging in the ground. The man said: "Sonny, why diggest thou?" The urchin solemnly replied: "I am seeking the unattainable." You gentlemen in trying to confer on Congress powers which the Constitution denied to it are also seeking the unattainable. The Constitution is against you, the opinions of the men who made it, so far as they ever expressed an opinion, are against you, the commentators are against you, and the precedents of 132 years are against you. You say the President with the veto power is against you. With all these forces against you, it requires courage in you to essay the impossible. I admire courage, but courage tempered with discretion. The bull that essayed the stunt of butting the railroad train off the track was long on courage but woefully short on discretion. You gentlemen know what happened to him. You are his mental brothers. His fate should warn you of what is in store for you. Verily, verily, you are "seeking the unattainable." [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, if this were a contest of personal force and influence, any Member of the House might well hesitate to take the floor immediately after the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the former Speaker of this House, with an argument opposing a position he had taken. But since it is a contest of facts and of principles, there need be no hesitation on the part of any man who takes the facts into consideration, though he take the opposite side from that advocated by the eloquent and able former Speaker. [Applause.] The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is always interesting and always effective, but he is not always right. [Applause.]

This resolution is not in any sense based on the theory that the House, or both Houses of Congress, have any right whatever to make a treaty with a foreign power. [Applause.] On the contrary, the declaration in paragraph 1 that the war is at an end is based on the doctrine that war may be terminated without a treaty, and that the collateral facts and circumstances in this case justify the declaration that the war between the United States and Germany has so ended.

On that point I might quote many authorities. I refer to Oppenheim, volume 2, page 322, of his great work on international law, in which he says—

> War may be terminated in three different ways: Belligerents may (1) abstain from further acts of war and glide into peaceful relations without expressly making peace through a special treaty, or (2) belligerents may formally establish the condition of peace through a special treaty of peace, or (3) a belligerent may end the war through subjugation of his adversary. (Oppenheim, International Law, vol. 2, p. 322.)

I might cite many other authorities. I will quote from one more, from Mr. Seward, the great Secretary of State in the Cabinet of Abraham Lincoln. He wrote on July 22, 1868:

> It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances. (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, July 22, 1868, Dip. Cor., 1868, vol. 2, pp. 32 to 34, cited Moore's International Law, vol. 7, p. 336.)

What are the collateral facts and circumstances in this case? Hostilities have ceased. There has been no fighting since the 11th of November, 1918, nearly a year and a half ago. Our Army has been brought home from France. Do we intend that it shall fight longer? It has been demobilized. The soldiers have returned to the pursuits of peace. Is there any intention on our part of continuing the war? The war forces of our enemy have been demobilized, and the enemy has ratified a treaty of peace with all the powers that were willing to ratify it. Germany has no intention of carrying on that war. The collateral facts and circumstances, it seems to me, are plain, and do establish the fact that the war is over. How many million men, women, and children in the United States have thanked God that the war is over? [Applause.] We know it. The gentleman from Missouri knows it. The war is over in every sense but that which is purely legal and technical.

The war began before we declared it. In our declaration we said that by repeated acts of hostility on the part of Germany against the United States, war already existed. After we knew it existed we declared it, as we had the right to. Now, after we know that peace exists, we have the right to say so. Section 1 is, therefore, an alternative of a treaty, and is not in any degree a usurpation of the treaty-making power. [Applause.]

The question may still be raised whether section 3 is an infringement of the treaty-making powers of the President and the Senate. It does make that provision which prohibits commercial intercourse with Germany depend on certain action of the German Government. So did the nonintercourse act of March 1, 1809, and the act of May 1, 1810, make our embargo at that time upon commercial intercourse between the United States and England, or between the United States and France, depend on the modification by England of her orders in council and on the modification by the Emperor Napoleon of his decrees of Berlin and of Milan.

The act of March 1, 1809, forbade commerce with England or France, because these two nations, which were at war with one another, had both interfered with the commerce of the United States. This act expired May 1, 1810, but on that date Congress passed an act which provided that if either England or France prior to a day named in the act should so revoke or modify her decrees as that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President should declare that fact by proclamation, whereupon commerce with the nation so modifying its edict should be resumed. If the other nation should not within a given time modify its decrees in like manner, then certain severe provisions of the act of March 1, 1809, should be revived and have full force and effect.

The embargo was to go into effect upon the mere proclamation by the President of the United States of the fact that either of these countries had failed to give us the suggested guaranty. That is exactly the provision in section 3 of the resolution now pending. It follows the course set by the act of Congress of May 1, 1810. This act was tested and sustained in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the brig Aurora, which sailed from Liverpool, England, and was seized and condemned under the provisions of the nonintercourse act.

The vessel had sailed under a misapprehension. Announcement had been made by Mr. Erskine, the British minister at Washington, that Great Britain had modified her orders in council; whereupon President Madison, as authorized by the act, issued a proclamation reestablishing trade between England and the United States. The British Government, however, repudiated its minister's declaration that the orders in council had been modified, and President Madison thereupon issued a new proclamation reviving as against Great Britain the provisions of the act of 1809.

The brig Aurora was seized for engaging in the trade forbidden by the law thus revived. Upon condemnation by the lower court the case was taken by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Justice Johnson, speaking for the whole court (7 Cr., 382), said:

> We can see no sufficient reason why the legislature should not exercise its discretion in reviving the act of March 1, 1809, either expressly or conditionally, as their judgment should direct.

In the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649, at 683) Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the court, cited the paragraph just quoted and said:

> This certainly is a decision that it was competent for Congress to make the revival of an act depend upon the proclamation of the President, showing the ascertainment by him of the fact that the edicts of a certain nation had been so revoked or modified that they did not violate the neutral commerce of the United States. The same principle would apply in the case of the suspension of an act upon a contingency to be ascertained by the President and made known by his proclamation.

Not only does the court in the case of Field against Clark thus interpret and confirm the principle that Congress has the right to make the operation of its own laws contingent upon the action of a foreign government, that action to be ascertained and announced by the President, but it makes that principle the basis of its decision in the case then under consideration.

The case was this: Section 3 of the tariff act of October 1, 1890—the McKinley tariff—authorized and directed the President, whenever the Government of any country producing and exporting certain enumerated articles imposed duties or other exactions on the products of the United States which, in view of the free introduction of the enumerated articles into the United States, were, in his opinion, unreasonable or unequal, to suspend as to that country the privilege of free importation and subject the articles in question to certain discriminating duties. After citing with approval the opinion in the case of the brig Aurora and commenting on it as quoted above, the opinion of the court continued:

> To what extent do precedents in legislation sustain the validity of the section under consideration, so far as it makes the suspension of certain provisions and the going into operation of other provisions of an act of Congress depend upon the action of the President, based upon the occurrence of subsequent events, or the ascertainment by him of certain facts to be made known by his proclamation? If we find that Congress has frequently, from the organization of the Government to the present time, conferred upon the President powers, with reference to trade and commerce, like those conferred by the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, that fact is entitled to great weight in determining the question before us.

The court then cited many acts of Congress, from the days of Washington to those of President Arthur, which authorized the President, upon ascertaining the action of foreign Governments, to continue or discontinue by proclamation the operation of embargo or other retaliatory or reciprocal acts of Congress affecting our commerce with such foreign nations. The opinion of the court then continues:

> It would seem to be unnecessary to make further reference to acts of Congress to show that the authority conferred upon the President by the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not an entirely new feature in the legislation of Congress, but has the sanction of many precedents in legislation.
> If the decision in the case of the brig Aurora had never been rendered, the practical construction of the Constitution by so many acts of Congress, and embracing almost the entire period of our national existence, should not be overruled unless upon a conviction that such legislation was clearly incompatible with the supreme law of the land.

In conclusion the court said:

> We perceive no errors in the judgments below and each is affirmed.

The provisions of section 3 of the pending resolution are closely parallel to those of the acts of 1809 and 1810. It provides that commerce now prohibited between the United States and Germany, except under license, shall be reestablished; but further provides that such trade and commerce shall again be prohibited, except under license, unless Germany within 45 days take the action mentioned in the section. The acts of 1809 and 1810 likewise prohibited commerce between the United States on the one hand and France and England on the other hand, unless those nations took certain action mentioned in the acts of Congress. Then as now the legislation provided that the President should ascertain and proclaim the facts as to the action taken or not taken by the foreign Government concerned.

Such action by Congress was not in 1809 or 1810, and it is not now, an attempt on the part of Congress to usurp the treaty-making powers of the President and the Senate. Thomas Jefferson was President in 1809; he did not think Congress was usurping the treaty-making powers; he signed the act. Madison, sometimes called the father of the Constitution, was President in 1810. He did not raise the question of the constitutionality of the action of Congress or think it was an invasion of the treaty-making powers. He signed the act; he issued the necessary proclamations and enforced the prohibition of commerce between the United States and the offending nation.

We are not making a treaty with Germany when we pass this resolution. We are asking for no contract; we are imposing a condition upon which we are willing to reestablish reciprocal trade with Germany. If that condition is met, our commerce will be established; if it is not met, commerce with Germany will be prohibited except under license.

This resolution does not propose to make any agreement with Germany, nor to ask Germany to make any agreement with us. The proclamation which the resolution authorizes the President to issue is not to be a proclamation announcing any agreement with Germany or any promise on the part of Germany. The proclamation is not to announce what Germany has promised to do, but what Germany has done.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. No; I have not sufficient time. Our course will be guided by the facts and by no agreement whatever.

But if it were an agreement between the two powers we have a precedent for such a situation also. I wish to call attention to the fact that there was once upon a time—and the gentlemen from Texas are probably more familiar with the details of the story than other Members of the House—there was a time when the State of Texas, as it now is, was an independent Republic. France and England sent ministers to the capital of the Republic of Texas. The very interesting diplomatic correspondence between the Republic of Texas and other powers has been published and is accessible to all who wish to read it. The United States made more than one treaty with the independent nation of Texas. The time came when Texas wished to be annexed to the United States, and the people of the United States also wished for that annexation. A treaty of annexation was prepared, was sent to the Senate, and the Senate voted against its ratification. What happened then? A joint resolution was passed through both Houses providing for the annexation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I would like to read a part of that joint resolution. The second section provided:

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the foregoing consent of Congress—

That is, consent to the annexation of Texas—is given upon the following conditions and with the following guaranty, to wit: First, said State to be formed subject to the adjustment by this Government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other Governments; and the constitution thereof, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people of said Republic of Texas, shall be transmitted to the President of the United States to be laid before Congress for its final action on or before the 1st day of January, 1846,

And so forth.

The treaty failed of ratification, whereupon the exact purpose of the treaty was accomplished by joint resolution.

Section 3 provided:

And be further

Resolved, That if the President of the United States shall, in his judgment and discretion, deem it most advisable, instead of proceeding to submit the foregoing resolution to the Republic of Texas as an overture on the part of the United States for admission, to negotiate with that Republic: Then be it.

Resolved, That a State, to be formed out of the present Republic of Texas, with suitable extent and boundaries and with two Representatives in Congress, until the next apportionment of representation, shall be admitted into the Union by virtue of this act on an equal footing with the existing States as soon as the terms and conditions of such admission * * * shall be agreed upon by the Governments of Texas and the United States.

So when the treaty of annexation could not be ratified in the Senate because a two-thirds vote could not be secured, a majority of the two Houses of Congress found a way to do what the people wanted done. The treaty failed, but a joint resolution accomplished the purpose of the treaty. Texas, an independent power, took notice of the joint resolution, and without waiting for a treaty became one of the States of the Union. Will the Texas Members to-day say that the action which admitted their State was unconstitutional? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, it seems to me that we have some precedents for this kind of work, and in spite of the very effective, somewhat flippant—if the gentleman will pardon me—but humorous and delightful speech of the gentleman from Missouri, we may still hold without fear and trembling that the thing that was done by Congress and was accepted by President Madison, the father of the Constitution, and has been sustained by decisions of the Supreme Court, are things that this Congress still has the right to do. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Moreover, this action by Congress will in no way interfere with the ratification of the treaty that was recently sent back to the President. I called attention yesterday to the treaty signed in Paris March 20, 1883, for the protection of industrial property. This treaty was sent to the Senate in 1883. It was rejected by the unanimous vote of the Senate June 12, 1884. President Arthur sent it back to the Senate in 1884, where, after long delay, it was ratified March 2, 1887. It is now in effect. The treaty was ratified four years after it had been signed, three years after it had been rejected.

No one wants the peace treaty to have a like history of delay, but long delays have already happened and ratification with reservations acceptable to the people of the United States does not seem likely in the near future. It will be ratified in some form, some time, or another treaty with Germany will be ratified instead of it, but in the meantime what is to be the status of our country and our people? Are we to be at war or at peace. Is business to be carried on under the hampering restrictions of war legislation? Are the extraordinary war powers of the President to continue, or shall we put an end to them? Let us do to-day what we ought to do and all we can do to restore normal conditions by reestablishing our laws and our institutions on their constitutional foundation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased with the statement made by the distinguished ex-Speaker, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, who is a real Democrat and my personal friend. He described George Washington coming into this body with all the framers of the Constitution and said they would not make a dent on the Republican side. That is true; they would not; they would add to the majority. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] If George Washington came down the aisle to-day and I should say to him, "What did you mean when as president of that Constitutional Convention and what did the convention mean in the very first sentence, reading 'Article I, section 1, all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in the Congress'?" And George would say, "It means just what it says; that the lawmaking power is in the Congress and not in the President of the United States." [Applause on the Republican side.] Then I would say to him, "What did you mean, sir, when you said Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations?" He would say, "It means just what it says," and he would also say, "I have read the Porter resolution; you have exercised your congressional power when you have attempted in section 3 to regulate commerce with the country with which you are at war, and you are absolutely right." Then he would come over and sit down by the side of STEVE PORTER and stay with us and vote with us. [Laughter and applause.]

My good friend said that too many cooks spoil the broth. As there were 80 cooks on the George Washington to feed the President I have no doubt that is what spoiled the broth at the peace table. [Laughter on the Republican side.] They kept out of that wonderful instrument every flavor of Americanism and brought us instead of the dove of peace the British lion in a covered basket. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Section 1, article 1, says that the lawmaking powers shall be in the Congress of the United States. If the President disagrees with the Congress we can overturn his will by a two-thirds vote, and we have done it in this very Congress. The power is here. If he refuses to obey the law, we can remove him. He can not remove a janitor out of this House, but under the Constitution that George Washington and his friends made the Congress can move him out of the White House. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] And they ought to have done it when he sent our troops to Russia without a declaration of war by the Congress of the United States, and they would have done it but for his condition of health, body and mind.

Section 3 of the resolution under consideration simply provides for a reestablishment of trade relations with Germany. It is not an attempt to make a treaty of peace. If it was I would not vote for it. The peace-making power, the making of a treaty, is not in the President of the United States alone. It is in two-thirds of the Senate of the United States. He has not the treaty-making power. He can negotiate a treaty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He did negotiate a treaty without the advice of the Senate, and he never took its advice, and by his own action in controlling the minority of that body he never got the consent of that body to the ratification of the treaty. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We may say the President is to blame; you may say the Senate is to blame. We need not quarrel about that. A treaty of peace has not been made; the treaty of peace has not been completed. There are other ways to settle war. President or Senate—put the blame where you please, I shall show you before I get through, and the people of this country know it, that the fault is in the White House, because the President stood in a stubborn place of saying, "You must have the treaty that I make, of my dictation," notwithstanding a large majority of his constitutional advisers have recommended and passed amendments to his treaty. He has left us in a condition of stagnation. Our manufactures are decreasing, and have in the last 90 days by 50 per cent. Our imports are increasing and our exports are decreasing. There is no phase of American life that is not held in abeyance, waiting and disturbed by the present situation. The Constitution makers said there might come a time when the Congress of the United States might find new occasions, and new occasions make new duties; and they provided in this section that we could take care of and should take care of the "general welfare" of your country and of mine. Is the general welfare at stake? Is there any danger with all these war measures lying in the hands of the Executive at the present time? We are at peace when he wants us at peace, and we are at war when he says we are at war. One statute we passed may be enforced to-day as a war measure, and if it should so please the administration, they can refuse to enforce it as a peace measure. At the White House they have the power of making laws. It is the first time in the history of this country where the President has had such great power. He has peace on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and war on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays—whenever it pleases him. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

When John Barleycorn knocked at the door he said, "You get out, we are at war"; and when these men who are threatened with prison, who labor and who are in labor unions, said, "Give us the right to make negotiations collectively," he said, "We are at war, and you will not do anything of the kind, and if you go on and strike you go to jail, because we are at war." But the next moment, when 100,000,000 people knock at his door and say, "For God's sake protect us under the war measure from these people who are robbing us on sugar, these profiteers," he whispers to an attendant and says: "Palmer is a candidate for President; Palmer is for the League of Nations; tell them when they want to regulate sugar that we are at peace." [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

He does not enforce—and it was stated right here on this floor yesterday that he does not enforce—all of these laws. Then you have left it in him not only to be the man who shall make the law, but the man who shall enforce the law. Mr. Speaker, it is time for us to speak on this matter; it is time to take some action. We have the right to declare a state of peace, and it would be a silly thing for the Constitution makers to say that having the power to make war we have not the power to stop it, and if PORTER and the rest of us should vote for such a proposition, then I think George Washington and the rest of his friends would move over onto the Democratic side and say that for once they were right. We do have the power to stop war—congressional power. The power is here. We answer only to the people, while the President is supposed to answer to the Congress, to enforce the laws passed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I wish at this moment to reply to a gentleman who placed such an erroneous construction upon gentlemen on this side of the Chamber when he called attention to the fact as to what possibly had caused the President's sickness. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] tried to quote me, and through a very strained construction claimed that we were not quite human over here, that we did not have the red blood and the Christian idea of being kind to a man who was sick. Why, Mr. Speaker, men on the battle field will help the enemy when he is wounded. There is not a man on either side of this Chamber who does not sympathize with one of us when we are sick or in trouble, or with the President of the United States. What I said then I must explain to the gentleman, who did not seem quite to get the point that I made. It may have been my fault that the joke I attempted, which was not as to his health, went by freight to the gentleman from Kentucky. [Laughter.] Let me call his attention to the way in which I spoke of his sickness. We are all sorry for the President of the United States. What we were laughing at was not at our good President's sickness, but at the fact that a Democratic Senator had uncovered him at a sudden time and place when he was well and on his campaign. He was saying in every State where he spoke that under this League of Nations Canada could not have a vote on the council. Mr. Speaker, I am not a constitutional lawyer, nor a very good lawyer. I am an attorney. I find that a great many constitutional attorneys are disturbed about this resolution, but I have not found any disturbance in the minds of any constitutional lawyers so far. [Laughter.] I was simply saying this, that the President of the United States has got caught in his own trap. He said out there repeatedly that Canada could not have any representation on the council, and it so happened that on the very day before he was taken sick a Democratic Senator from Missouri—a dreadful thing, the "show me" State—called attention to the fact that he was not telling what was right and true. The peace commissioner representing Canada at the peace table, Mr. Borden, was trying to get a ratification of the treaty in the Canadian Parliament. The Canadian Parliament in opposition—and we all have oppositions—arose and said, "We do not want to ratify this, because Canada can not have a place on the council." "Oh, yes," said Mr. Borden, "Canada can have a place on the council, even though Great Britain has one." But they replied, "Mr. Wilson is President of the United States, and only yesterday he said that Canada could not have." Then Mr. Borden dug down in his right-hand or left-hand pocket and brought to the attention of the world a signed agreement of Woodrow Wilson, Clemenceau, and Lloyd-George to the effect that the contention of the minister of Canada was sound and they could have a man on the council that could hear and determine even questions between the United States and Great Britain. Then the question came, Who was right? President Wilson, I submit, had made a secret agreement, a construction of which, admitted by Republicans and Democrats alike, was that Canada should have an equal show in the council as well as in the assembly, and then it became rather a joke from a political standpoint. I do not use hard language. I heard some one say "liar," this, that, and the other. I would not say that about the President. He said out there that Canada could not have, after he had signed an agreement that she could have. He is a diplomat. [Applause on the Republican side.] Some honest people can not find out just where diplomacy lays off and lying begins. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce to the gentleman that he has consumed 15 minutes of his time.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, time is very scarce. Each one has the right to print for home consumption. [Laughter.] I was only going to show by a table which I have prepared that this so-called treaty and League of Nations was amended by a majority of the Senate that was elected by the people for that place. One hundred and sixty-odd Democratic votes were cast for that on the 14 amendments, and I have prepared a table which shows there was an average of over 11 Democrats who voted for every amendment, and the treaty as amended would have passed the Senate but for the fact the President of the United States absolutely withheld his consent. So do not blame us. Let us not blame anybody. If you want to go to the people on that issue, my friend from Kentucky, just remember you did go on it in Kentucky and that good old Democratic State gave 40,000 Republican majority by reason of your argument in favor of this proposition. [Applause on the Republican side.] But I do not want to try it out as a party question. I had hoped and I believed, and I intended to stand against this rule, for I believe in amendments, I believe in fair consultation upon both sides, and my colleague upon the committee who has spoken in our favor, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], will bear me out. I believe I have taken it as a nonpartisan question, but your chairman of your party came here, and then, as my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] said, before we had drawn the resolution Mr. Cummings announced you would oppose it and the President would veto it. There was nothing else for us to do, and instead of having the benefit of your advice you forced us into a position where we had to do the best we could, and we have presented this, for it means peace; it means a step toward peace; it means a lightening of the burdens; it means the taking away of legislative power from the Executive; it means comfort to the weary, war-worn people of this world to know that the popular branch of this Congress has declared in favor of peace. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I wanted to go further myself and make a resolution which would declare peace with all the world. I wanted to include Austria. I think that is our duty, but the answer of my colleague was that the Senate and the President are still considering the treaty and are not considering a treaty with Germany. On the contrary, the leading Democrat over here in charge of it says that President Wilson is enjoying himself while the Senate is worrying and stewing over what they are going to do about the treaty. I remember that Nero played the fiddle, I think, while Rome burned. I can see him enjoying himself while the people of the United States, 100,000,000, are asking and praying for peace, peace—your tax laws, your laws that keep the prisons full of men for political reasons, your laws which we allow the Department of Justice to enforce against profiteers in one place and in favor of profiteers in another. We want peace, and I will yield any position I ever had or hope to have or my personal association with the party if you will show a better way to have peace for the people of this country. You offer a resolution or an amendment that comes within the power of the Congress and you will get at least one vote if you can show me any way to bring to this country the blessings of peace.

Mr. Speaker, last September, six months ago, when it was perfectly apparent the treaty of peace could not be ratified with the American reservations, seeing the injury coming to our country by remaining in a state of war, I offered the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the United States of America is at peace with all the world.

When the Senators sent the "round robin" to the President that his league covenant, which placed our country under a superstate, could not be ratified and the President assured the country that he would not permit the Senate to ratify an amended treaty, it was apparent to everyone that he intended to keep us in a "state of war" for partisan purposes until this fall election. Friends discredited my judgment, but in view of his later statements that he wishes to submit the covenant to the people, is conclusive proof that he has had it in his mind ever since he left for Paris; that as he won his last election by "keeping us out of war," he might win another one for himself or some of the reigning family by keeping us out of peace. As Republicans we would welcome the issue, but as Americans we can hardly find language strong enough to condemn the unpatriotic idea of continuing the state of war for party gain. Since the day of his partisan letter to the sixth district of Indiana, six weeks after the beginning of the war, and after his violation of law in refusing to accept volunteers, to keep Theodore Roosevelt out of the United States Army, he has not hesitated to sacrifice American blood and treasure to advance his personal and party interest. Gentlemen who condemned me for telling the truth about him, now admit to me it was best to tell it as we went along. To-day our allies are at peace and getting ahead of us in all foreign trade, our domestic affairs are unsettled, our people are overtaxed.

The harsh war measures burden the people by depriving them of their constitutional rights, and in the midst of this unrest it is the duty of a Republican Congress to give the people what they want, and that is peace, and the repeal of the war laws. Wilson says let the people suffer that we may win for the party. Bryan says let us have peace to win for the party; while the Democratic mule wisely ponders whether it is best to run Wilson for a third term or run Bryan for a fourth time for a first term.

To show the necessity for a declaration of peace, I propose to set out in full the articles which were limited by the Lodge reservations, and the reservations as adopted by the Senate which Wilson defeated by voting against the treaty those senatorial minds which "go along" with his.

It is interesting to note that the majority of Senators elected by the people insisted on the American reservations, and a minority controlled by Wilson defeated the treaty. If considered by a question of majority—democracy—please hear the following table which shows that States having more than two-thirds of the inhabitants of the United States voted to amend the treaty, and if four of the small Democratic States controlled by Mr. Wilson—even seven votes controlled by him—would have ratified the treaty by 56 to 28. We are forced to the conclusion that he preferred a partisan issue to peace on earth.

An average majority of over 28 on each reservation. Then by the President's order the treaty was defeated, although a majority of 14 voted to ratify it.

The reservation in the resolving clause is as follows. It is a simple statement that we will not be bound by its terms unless the contracting parties accept our terms with theirs. What intelligent man can object to this?

RESOLVING CLAUSE.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

I print reservations in the order given by Senators LODGE and HITCHCOCK in Senate Document 193:

RESERVATION NO. 4.

The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States, and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

What American wants to submit our domestic questions to other nations? The last statement of Col. Roosevelt was, when commenting on the League of Nations, as follows:

Moreover, no international court must be entrusted with the decision of what is and what is not justiciable. In the articles of agreement the nonjusticiable matters should be as sharply defined as possible, and until some better plan can be devised the Nation itself must reserve to itself the right as each case arises to say what these matters are.

I beg you to read again the reservation, and say which of these domestic or home questions you would submit to a foreign, and possibly an unfriendly, country. Would you submit our tariff laws to our business rivals? Would you let any other country vote on our immigration laws?

The next reservation is No. 6, and to understand it we should read articles 156, 157, and 158, as it relates to the robbery of the Chinese Republic by the autocrat Japan:

SECTION VIII.

Shantung.

ARTICLE 156.

Germany renounces, in favor of Japan, all her rights, title and privileges—particularly those concerning the territory of Kiaochow, railways, mines and submarine cables—which she acquired in virtue of the treaty concluded by her with China on March 6, 1898, and of all other arrangements relative to the Province of Shantung.

All German rights in the Tsingtau-Tsinanfu Railway, including its branch lines, together with its subsidiary property of all kinds, stations, shops, fixed and rolling stock, mines, plant and material for the exploitation of the mines, are and remain acquired by Japan, together with all rights and privileges attaching thereto.

The German State submarine cables from Tsingtau to Shanghai and from Tsingtau to Chefoo, with all the rights, privileges and properties attaching thereto, are similarly acquired by Japan, free and clear of all charges and encumbrances.

ARTICLE 157.

The movable and immovable property owned by the German State in the territory of Kiaochow, as well as all the rights which Germany might claim in consequence of the works or improvements made or of the expenses incurred by her, directly or indirectly, in connection with this territory, are and remain acquired by Japan, free and clear of all charges and encumbrances.

ARTICLE 158.

Germany shall hand over to Japan within three months from the coming into force of the present treaty the archives, registers, plans, title-deeds, and documents of every kind, wherever they may be, relating to the administration, whether civil, military, financial, judicial, or other, of the territory of Kiaochow.

Within the same period Germany shall give particulars to Japan of all treaties, arrangements, or agreements relating to the rights, title, or privileges referred to in the two preceding articles.

The shame of the century is in the above articles. It is an attempt to consummate the things we went to war against. It is in keeping with the most wicked secret treaty between a king and a mikado and should have been denounced by the President and the Senate.

However, for diplomatic reasons this mild reservation was made. This article, together with article 10, would have compelled us to furnish American lives to "preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity" of Japan in stolen property. Here is—

RESERVATION NO. 6.

The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan.

RESERVATION NO. 7.

* * * * * * *

No person shall represent the United States under either said League of Nations or the treaty of peace with Germany, or be authorized to perform any act for or on behalf of the United States thereunder, and no citizen of the United States shall be selected or appointed as a member of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences except with the approval of the Senate of the United States.

This deprives the President of autocratic power never possessed by an American President.

All ministers and consuls have to be confirmed by a senate, elected by the people.

Woodrow Wilson would not have objected to this reservation before the last election. He had a subservient House and Senate until rebuked by the last election, and naturally does not want the people's representatives to be consulted about the man or men who represent this country anywhere. The evidence of Mr. Bullitt shows that it was Wilson's vote at the peace conference that prevented the adoption of a plan whereby the parliaments of the powers were to be consulted in selecting members of the council and assembly.

Did this reservation break the "heart of the world" or crack the ambition of Woodrow Wilson? All I ask is for any real American to read—

RESERVATION NO. 10.

If the United States shall at any time adopt any plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8, it reserves the right to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

Reservation No. 1, relative to our withdrawal from the league, article 1, provides that—

Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

Therefore if the people of the United States attempted to withdraw from the League of Nations, they must give two years' notice, and then not be allowed to withdraw until they had performed all things required by the league. If the Kings wanted to keep the Republics in, how easy to say, "You have not fulfilled your obligations under the covenant." And how natural it was for an American Senator to vote for this.

RESERVATION NO. 1.

The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

A concurrent resolution is passed by Congress and does not require the signature of the President. If a Congress was elected with a majority in favor of withdrawing from this league they could do so even against the will of the President, but without this reservation providing for a concurrent resolution the President might veto it, and keep us in, in spite of the wish of a majority of Congress.

Does this reservation break the heart of the world, or cause a pain in the heart of the President?

Article 16 of the league is as follows:

Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.

It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

The members of the league agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article, in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the members of the league which are cooperating to protect the covenants of the league.

Any member of the league which has violated any covenant of the league may be declared to be no longer a member of the league by a vote of the council, concurred in by the representatives of all the other members of the league represented thereon.

This drastic rule of preventing all financial or personal intercourse between the nationals has never been resorted to under the conditions stated, and the following reservation was necessary:

RESERVATION NO. 11.

The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than that violating said article 16, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

The most glaring abandonment of equality of representation is in articles 1, 2, 3, and 4, which would give Great Britain more votes than the United States has. It is almost unthinkable that any American would vote for such a proposition. There might have been some doubt as to the construction to be given to the covenant on this question, but since Senator REED, a Democratic Senator from Missouri, inserted in the RECORD the secret note signed by Clemenceau, Lloyd-George, and President Wilson, assenting to Canada's claim that she might have a seat in the council, no one raises the question. It will be noted that the Prime Minister of Canada was forced to exhibit this secret note before he could get ratification of the peace treaty by the Canadian Parliament. The leading statesmen of England saw the unfairness of their having more votes than the United States; how then could any American object to—

RESERVATION NO. 14.

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate have cast more than one vote, and assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member, or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

Article 10 of the covenant, the most dangerous to American peace, is so important that a brief review of its diplomatic history will be interesting. President Wilson announced the doctrine of "self-determination," and went to the King's table and the peace table with that thought in his mind. If you have any doubt of it, read the following article 3 in his—Wilson's—original draft. After royal trimming and English decorations, it emerged as article 10 in the covenant. (See Evidence of Bullitt, vol. 2, p. 1172.)

The contracting powers unite in guaranteeing to each other political independence and territorial integrity; but it is understood between them that such territorial readjustments, if any, as may in the future become necessary by reason of changes in present racial conditions and aspirations or present social and political relationships, pursuant to the principle of self-determination, and also such territorial readjustments as may in the judgment of three-fourths of the delegates be demanded by the welfare and manifest interest of the peoples concerned, may be effected if agreeable to those peoples; and that territorial changes may in equity involve material compensation. The contracting powers accept without reservation the principle that the peace of the world is superior in importance to every question of political jurisdiction or boundary.

It emerges as article 10, and would not be recognized after Mr. Wilson's association with royalty but for the fact that it deals with our guaranteeing the territorial integrity of all parties signing the treaty. In article 10 which Kings and Mikados made out of Wilson's article 3 there is no word of "self-determination," no word of territorial adjustments as may be "demanded by the welfare and manifest interests of the peoples concerned."

No hint of the splendid thought that the "peace of the world" was superior to "political jurisdiction or boundary" under Mr. Wilson's original draft—India, Egypt, Ireland, South Africa, Korea, and China—might hope for relief, but all high ideals of human liberty and self-government are swept away by—

ARTICLE 10.

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

How can we guarantee England, Italy, Japan, or any nation its "territorial integrity" unless we are prepared to do so by force of arms?

What American associated with Mr. Wilson agreed with him on article 10? Certainly not House, Lansing, or Bullitt. Certainly not the international lawyers employed by President Wilson. Listen to what his own attorneys say as to article 10—at one time article 3. It was submitted to his international lawyers, men of distinction and of his own choosing.

This is their answer, volume 2, page 1183, evidence of Bullitt hearings before United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session:

But aside from any questions of several joint or collective guaranties and their proper language, the question of policy presented by this article in its first sentence is whether the United States should favor a guaranty of independence and integrity of every State by every other State.

Such an agreement would destroy the Monroe doctrine. Under such an agreement, Germany, as well as the United States and even despite the United States, would have been bound to support Venezuela against Great Britain in 1895. Under such an agreement, Great Britain, France, and Japan might be bound to intervene in Chile or in Peru, according to their views of the Tacna-Arica dispute, either in addition to intervention by the United States.

Indeed, any guaranty of independence and integrity means war by the guarantor if a breach of the independence or integrity of the guaranteed State is attempted and persisted in.

What the United States has done, is doing, and will do for Europe is enough, without making an unasked sacrifice of her interests and those of Latin America, by giving up a policy which has prevented the countries south of the Rio Grande from being pawns in the diplomacy of Europe.

Mr. Wilson's own legal advisers make the suggestion—same page—that instead of thus guaranteeing each nation its territory as against the world we should say:

SUGGESTION.

Each contracting power severally covenants and guarantees that it will not violate the territorial integrity or impair the political independence of any other contracting power.

The contracting powers recognize as a binding principle that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any extrinsic powers.

It would be safe for us to agree that "we will not violate" the territory of another, but to guarantee that others would not simply means perpetual war for the United States. The council, in case of "threats or danger of aggression," shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled. Article 16, above quoted, also provides in such cases what we shall contribute to the armed forces to protect the covenants of the league.

Under our supreme law, Congress alone can declare war; and it was not only fair to our people but fair to our allies to call attention to that fact by—

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

What does Mr. Wilson say to the reservation? He says, of course, Congress alone can declare war; of course, they all knew that around the peace table. That is a true statement of our supreme law, but he says in his letter it is supererogation. He uses this large word twice. It means, according to the Standard Dictionary, "the performance of any meritorious act in excess of the demands of duty, hence superfluous." The professor is willing to destroy the League of Nations and "break the heart of the world" rather than rupture his rule of rhetoric.

To be perfectly fair, I read from his last letter, of March 8:

WHAT WAS UNDERSTOOD.

It was understood, as a matter of course, at the conference in Paris that whatever obligations any government assumed or whatever duties it undertook under the treaty would, of course, have to be fulfilled by its usual and established constitutional methods of action.

Once or twice in meetings of the conference, when the treaty was under consideration, "reservations" were made to that effect by the representatives of individual powers, and these "reservations" were invariably received in the way in which men who have met for business and not for talk always receive acts of scrupulous supererogation—listened to with indifferent silence, as such men listen to what is a matter of course and was not necessary to say.

IS GLAD TO EXPLAIN.

There can be no objection to explaining again what our constitutional method is, and that our Congress alone can declare war or determine the causes or occasions for war, and that it alone can authorize the use of the armed forces of the United States, on land or on the seas. But to make such a declaration would certainly be a work of supererogation.

This is his answer to the Senate reservation which simply notifies our allies and all the world that Wilson and the Senate can not make a treaty which will force us into war without an act of Congress. He has lost his cunning. He does not deceive the people who feel he wants us in war in November, any more than he was able to deceive the people as to why he removed Lansing. What England expected of us is perfectly apparent. She expected to use our lives and our money to maintain her Empire. The leading King's organ in Canada, the Star, in an editorial lately printed, bewails the fact that Britain can not call us to send our troops to Baku. Look it up on the map. I have not had time. Ninety-nine per cent of Americans do not know and do not care whether Imperial Britain gets the oil there or whether it goes to the people who own it. Is it not too bad Wilson can not send a few American boys to fill graves in Baku to help Great Britain provide for the "responsibility of empire"? Read the editorial and comments, taken from the News Letter, November 12, 1920:

Americans who scoff at the suggestion that the League of Nations is a machine reared by Great Britain to guarantee a continuance of her control of world affairs might do well to read an editorial printed a few weeks ago in the Montreal Daily Star. The Star is the leading imperialist organ in Canada. Those who control it are of the innermost British imperial councils. The editorial is headed, "An hour of peril." It starts off, "War-weary Britain is learning once more with a tragic thoroughness the full meaning of the responsibility of empire." That, of course, is quite true to form. The average imperialist is firmly convinced that these "responsibilities of empire" are a complete justification for empire. The "peril" to which the editorial alludes is the peril to British interests, born of bolshevism and of Moslem unrest. "A sudden thrust," reads the editorial, "might threaten the life of the British Empire more surely than would a Prussian victory in 1914. The Bolshevists, not finding the supplies of oil and petrol which they expected at Krasnovodsk, are stretching out their tentacles toward the western coast of the Caspian, their envious eyes fixed on Baku, the control of which Britain can not afford to relinquish. With a force of Afghans and Bolshevists joined at Merv, we have no assurance that the Amir's army will not throw open the passes of Afghanistan, which are the northern doors of India. With a powerful fleet in the Black Sea dominating Constantinople and dividing the Turks of Europe from those of Asia, with large military forces in India and new reenforcements operating from the Baku area, with the assistance of her new-found friends, the Arabs and her wards of Persia, Britain is squaring her shoulders again for the worst. Had the League of Nations been in operation six months ago Britain could have called to her aid her partners in the covenant. To-day she must play a lone hand." Analyze that editorial, which may be regarded as presenting the typical British imperial viewpoint. It announces that the "life of the British Empire" is in peril; that English oil interests must be maintained in trans-Caucasia; that English domination in India must be upheld at all hazards; and that England already is making military use of her "new-found friends" in the British-controlled myth kingdom of the Hedjaz and of her "wards" of Persia. But above all is the assertion that "had the League of Nations been in operation six months ago Britain could have called to her aid her partners in the covenant"—forced them to go into battle to uphold her commercial and imperial interests. Let America beware. The menace to which the editorial alludes may not exist at this moment. But sooner or later British imperial interests will again be threatened. Perhaps the threat will come from an Ireland bent upon bursting her fetters. Perhaps from Egypt. Perhaps from English oil interests, not in Russian Georgia this time, but in American Mexico. When that day comes England will again call for assistance to uphold her world sway. If America, when the new call echoes forth, is a member of the British-controlled league, woe be to her. "Had the League of Nations been in operation six months ago Britain could have called to her aid her partners in the covenant." So it will be in the future. To-day, then, there must be no compromise. If American interests are to be preserved the United States must not become a party to the league.

Those who have sons to sacrifice to see that England holds Baku stand up and shout for the League of Nations. Those of you who believe in fighting only for our country thank God the danger of the League of Nations is almost passed.

All writers on international law agree that war may be terminated in three distinct ways; one by simply stopping fighting, without an agreement, the second is by one conquering the other, and the third by a treaty of peace.

Under international law it is the duty of the several departments of the Government to do everything necessary to carry out a treaty of peace. By our Constitution a treaty is the supreme law of the land, and Congress would be legally and morally bound to make appropriations to carry out all the terms of a peace treaty.

Since the organization of this Government there has been conflict of opinion among the best writers as to whether Congress is bound by a treaty to make all appropriations and pass all laws necessary to carry out a treaty.

Washington said that it was perfectly clear to his understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives was not necessary for the validity of a treaty. That is, of course, true; but there has been a contention constantly by American writers that Congress was acting within its legal and moral scope if they refuse to pass the laws required by a treaty if, in the opinion of Congress, the treaty-making power exceeds its constitutional rights or if, in the opinion of Congress, such so-called necessary laws were against the interest of the people of the United States.

Congress has always in the past made the necessary laws and made the necessary appropriations to carry out all of its treaties, but there has always been a serious contention—one side saying that you have a treaty agreement and you are bound to pass these laws, and under the strict rule of international law they have complied.

This Government passed the necessary laws in 1796 to carry out the treaty with Great Britain in 1794; in 1816 they passed the necessary laws to carry out a commercial treaty or convention with Great Britain. They did the same in 1842 and 1843 with respect to a treaty of Washington, and after the Mexican War provided the necessary laws to carry out the treaty of peace with Mexico. In every case the claim was made that under international law we were bound to do this, and where an American objected by saying Congress alone has the power to appropriate money, the answer given by Great Britain and Mexico would be "True, your Constitution requires that Congress shall make appropriations, but the same Constitution authorizes the President and the Senate to make treaties and conventions"; and that has been a complete answer for the foreign State; men will say that they made treaties in good faith without the knowledge as to the constitutional limitations of the President and Senate. Now, for the first time in the history of the United States our allies ask us to ratify a treaty of peace which will authorize a foreign court to order us into war; and if we approve, the same old argument will be used, and Great Britain or Japan, if she goes into war, and the supreme council advises us how many men, how much money, and how many ships they want, they will say at once, "Congress, you are morally bound and under international law you are legally bound to furnish your troops, furnish your men and ships to defend Great Britain or Japan," and we will have no legal or moral answer to their claim unless we give specific notice to our allies that under our Constitution Congress alone can declare war, and if any power on earth calls us to war the American people reserve the right, through their representatives, to decide whether they shall go to war; and if so, on which side.

The same suggestion applies to the reservation which notifies the high contracting parties that the Congress of the United States reserves to itself the right to pass upon appropriations, but it is not of such moral or vital interest for the people to control appropriations as it is for them to retain control of the lives and honor of their citizens. Gentlemen may say that these reservations which reserve the constitutional powers to Congress are in derogation of international law—that it amends international law.

In my opinion there is no doubt about that—international law has not kept pace with civil law, and this is not the first case where the United States of America has given a new construction to international law in the interest of justice and civilization; for instance, the recognition of a new State before the birth of this Government was recognized as a cause for war by the parent State, and such recognition meant intervention. Since the days of Thomas Jefferson the United States has had a fixed policy of recognition of a new State without intervention; it has been done whenever we have had an American Congress and an American President, and no parent State from which the new State springs has ever found it a cause for war; but, on the contrary, it is accepted as one of the American's rights to make recognition without intervention whenever the little peoples of the world have sought self-determination.

Many instances could be cited where the birth of this Republic started with the reformation in the international law, and no more striking illustration can be made than to use the reservations to article 10, for it says to Great Britain, with whom we have had treaties in the past, beginning with our treaty after the Revolutionary War on down to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, after the close of the Mexican War, on down to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty No. 2 on the Panama Canal. We say to them in so many words that you have made a treaty with our President and Senate and have taken money from the people of the United States, because under the international law we felt bound to carry out those treaties, and we did it.

For half a century, by the cunning of your Clayton-Bulwer treaty and by craft of your diplomacy, you kept us from constructing the Panama Canal; by your influence you got the President of the United States to violate his pledge and to give some strange construction to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by compelling us Americans to pay toll on ships sailing in waters every drop of which is American and every foot of the shore line on both sides of the canal American property. You have in diplomacy beaten us for more than a hundred years; you never have and never can beat us in war, but you have bled us financially in the past as you are doing now, and we give you notice by reservation to article 10 that you can not, with the aid of your self-governing colonies, order us to sacrifice money or American life, and we call your attention to the fact that Congress must appropriate life and money. The American people intend that America shall use that power given to them by the Constitution, and that each separate case shall use that power as the interest of our country and demands of justice shall dictate.

Under our Constitution all appropriations must be made by Congress, and we give notice to the world of that fact in—

RESERVATION NO. 9.

The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States.

This is a true statement of fact, and if President Wilson did not want to keep us in war for political purposes he would not pocket the treaty or instruct his free-thinking, free-acting, independent Senators to beat it on account of supererogation.

Mr. Speaker. I could not secure favorable action on my declaration of peace, so I yield to the judgment of my colleagues, but I prefer the straight declaration of "peace with all the world," for I wish to declare peace with Austria and with Russia. We declared a state of war with Austria. That people never wanted war with us. There are millions of her citizens who have sought our shores and our shelter. They are an industrious and an honest people. They seek citizenship here. The Senate holds the treaty and can not consistently accept it without these American reservations in the covenant.

Mr. Speaker, I still hope for the broad declaration and reserved the right to present it to the House, but having great respect for the judgment and patriotism of my associates on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and having been notified by the Democratic chairman that his party will oppose our ending of the war, and that Wilson will veto it if we pass it, I must yield my point and vote for the resolution as reported by the committee. I feel sure of our constitutional power to declare the war at an end, and under our power of legislation to fix a date which repeals the war laws. And even if the section which makes conditions with Germany should be held to be beyond our power, yet the other sections will stand.

Mr. Speaker, I vote under protest for a joint resolution. That requires the signature of the President. He has already declared the war at an end. The resolution I offered and prefer is a concurrent resolution and does not require the approval of the President. It is a congressional finding the same as that already found by the President in the war of 1861–1865.

The House, July 22, 1861, passed a House resolution stating the objects of war, to maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and that as soon as the object was accomplished the war ought to cease.

The Senate, July 25, 1861, adopted a Senate resolution practically the same. Neither was joint or concurrent, but President Johnson used them as a basis for his proclamations, as they expressed the "will of Congress."

The President by proclamation, April 2, 1866, declared the objects of the war had been obtained except in Texas, and on August 20, 1866, the President proclaimed the object of war had been obtained in Texas and proclaimed that the "insurrection is at an end."

And the Supreme Court held that the war ended on the day of the proclamation, August 20, 1866. In other words, the House by House resolution and the Senate by Senate resolution expressed "the will of Congress." Neither one was signed by the President, yet the Supreme Court of the United States held in United States against Anderson (9 Wallace) that it was the acts of Congress and the proclamation of President Johnson that fixed the date on which the war ended. Congress in March, 1867, fixed June 20 as the day the Rebellion closed. President Wilson has made his statement that the war was ended no less than twelve times to us. Why ask him to repeat when we know that with him war is over for some things and in full blast for other things? At the White House, as I stated before, we are at peace Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and at war Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, and the chairman of the Democratic committee knows on which day he will consider our resolution of peace. Why trust him, anyway?

Our Democratic brethern are trying to "bell the cat" by asking him to say he will not be a candidate at Frisco. Suppose he did promise? What did he promise on his first run in 1912? He promised that he would not be a candidate for a second term. Which one of his friends will testify that on presidential running his reputation for truth and veracity is good in the neighborhood where he resides?

AS TO RUSSIA.

Gentlemen may say, "We are not at war with Russia." If that is so, our declaration that we are at peace with all the world can do no harm. Some professor may say it is supererogation. Big words do not frighten us now as they used to.

We have been in a state of war with Russia. Our soldiers are buried there and she is knocking at our door for peace. Four thousand of my constituents who were conscripted to fight Germany were sent there, according to Pershing's report, to fight Bolsheviki, and, according to Wilson's report, not to fight anyone. I shall prove by Mr. Wilson's own statement that he was and was not at war.

I shall show his statement of instructions to guard a railroad, and so forth, and not to fight, and then show his agreement to help Kolchak fight the soviet government, and Kolchak's agreement to pay the $14,000,000,000 in bonds of royal Russia. When you have read or heard the evidence of the President and members of his Cabinet, you can decide whether we are or have been at war with Russia, and whether we ought not to declare peace broad enough to remove any doubt as to being at war with Russia. I started out in the investigation of our situation in Russia for the purpose of securing the release of 5,000 of my constituents who were enlisted—most of them drafted—to fight Germany and were sent to the frozen north—Russia, our ally—to fight, freeze, suffer, and some to die in fighting a people against whom Congress had not declared war. They were kept there more than a year fighting after the armistice was signed. If you wish to know the degradation and humiliation heaped on American officers and men, read the book of Albertson, "Fighting without war." He was a volunteer worker for humanity in the Red Cross or the Y. M. C. A. His story is free from "self," but a simple, and I know from many of my constituents who were there, a truthful, pathetic statement of our boys fighting when they never saw our flag, and were constantly asking, "Why are we fighting here," and "For God's sake, send us an American flag."

More than a year ago, while fighting for the release of my constituents from a Russian hades, I felt the sinister work of bondholders in America who were willing to sacrifice American lives to collect their money. They even wrote me that I was interfering with the collection of their money, which they loaned Imperial Russia before we went into the war. Though we were neutral, they claimed they "scalped" Russian bonds in a spirit of patriotism.

Some of you thought Lincoln Colcord was a crazy Bolsheviki when in his "Carving of Russia" he told the truth as to what was happening, and visioned the attempt of the international bankers to maintain Governments throughout the world which will "pay the bills of war." (See The Nation, July, 1919.)

I will show you by reports lately received by the committee that Mr. Wilson was solicited for months early in 1918 to commit acts of war against our allies, the Russians, to take part in the civil war there between the Kolchak and Lenin governments. He stood for months on high ground. He refused, but as time wore on he yielded to and worshiped the golden calf.

May I use the deadly parallel to show by Mr. Wilson that we were and were not at war with Russia?

President Wilson to the Senate, July 22, 1919:

"The instruction to Gen. Graves directs him not to interfere in Russian affairs, but to support Mr. Stevens wherever necessary."

President Wilson and others to Kolchak, May 26, 1919:

"We are therefore disposed to assist the government of Admiral Kolchak and his associates with munitions, supplies, and food to establish themselves as the government of all Russia."

If you have trouble in weighing the conflict of evidence between Commissioner Wilson and President Wilson, look at the dates of papers signed by him and quoted above. When he signed the statement of June 22, 1919, as President, stating instruction of Gen. Graves of "noninterference," he had about a month before—May 26, same year—signed a statement as a self-appointed peace commissioner to furnish the fighting men at war with the soviet government munitions, supplies, and so forth.

Let us call Gen. Pershing, who has no diplomatic training in perversion of tongues, and who is as honest as he is brave. This is from his report, page 55:

It was the opinion of the supreme war council that troops should be sent to cooperate * * * against the Bolshevist forces.

This witness corroborates Commissioner Wilson and contradicts President Wilson.

I call for the next important witness, Mr. Secretary Baker. He was kind enough to reply to my resolutions before the Military Committee and before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He is bright, quick of mind and tongue, more resourceful and versatile as a witness than Mr. Lansing. His mind "goes along" with President Wilson and with Commissioner Wilson. He must have been both present and absent at the Cabinet meetings which landed Lansing on the sidewalk; so, of course, we were at war in Russia with Commissioner Wilson and at peace in Russia with President Wilson on the same day.

ON SEPTEMBER 15, 1919.

This witness, Secretary of War Baker, after repeating the theory on which our troops were sent to Siberia and northern Russia, said, page 22, hearings, Military Affairs:

For these reasons, although the Czechs are now substantially out of Siberia, it was decided that the allied forces in Siberia should continue to guard the railroad. The American Army is not participating in favor of Admiral Kolchak. It is not participating either for or against Bolshevists.

Now, he certainly supports President Wilson that we were at peace in all Russia. It may hurt the pride of a real American that our soldiers were track laborers and guards for railroads in Siberia. Policemen and guards do not make war, but peace.

The statement of Secretary Baker before the Committee on Foreign Affairs shows we were at war. He testified that he was then selling millions of dollars worth of the American people's goods, war munitions, and so forth, to a man named Uget, and he took Mr. Uget's personal note for the property, and that he, the Secretary, knew these goods were being sent to Kolchak, who was fighting on one side of the civil war. The Secretary very promptly said it was not an act of war, because he sold the goods to Uget and made no official recognition of the Kolchak government. Of course, if he had kept the promise of Commissioner Wilson and sent the guns direct to Kolchak, he would have violated the statement of President Wilson that we were at peace in Russia.

Whether we have recognized any government in Russia or not is important in considering whether we want to declare peace with that country.

When the Kerensky government fell, we were notified of that fact. The Russian Government (Zarist and Kerensky) had purchased large supplies in this country, and we had given to the Russian Government a credit of $450,000,000 on which we had advanced $186,400,000. The following is from a statement of Mr. Undersecretary Polk:

On November 7, the Kerensky government was overthrown. On the 15th the first payment of interest on obligations held by the United States was due and the Treasury advanced against an obligation signed by Mr. Bakhmeteff the sum of $1,329,750, which were at once repaid to the Treasury as interest on advances which had been made by it to Russia. This brought the total of the cash advances made by the Treasury of the United States to $187,729,750.

Mr. Polk stated, at page 23:

Mr. Bakhmeteff turned it over to the City Bank to the credit of the Russian Government, but he could not draw against it—

And so forth.

We saw that the money was used in the liquidation of the Russian debts.

Again, on page 29, he says:

Mr. MCFADDEN. He has had complete control of a certain amount of the funds, has he not?

Mr. POLK. He had control of one separate amount, a very small amount, but he had no control over these large items. Since December, 1917, my understanding is that every payment of any size was made with the knowledge of this Government.

Mr. MCFADDEN. That is, when he drew checks in settlement of these accounts they had to be approved by the Treasury Department before the banks would honor the checks?

Mr. POLK. The bank would not honor checks if the Treasury objected and no check was honored until the Treasury was notified.

Mr. MCFADDEN. The expense of keeping up the embassy was paid by Bakhmeteff, with the approval of the Treasury Department?

Mr. POLK. We have not questioned his right to spend a small amount of money for the expenses of the embassy, and I understand the Treasury have therefore not objected to such payments.

Surely, then, Mr. Bakhmeteff was not an ambassador using his country's money, or our State and Treasury Departments would not have kept control of the funds. Surely, you could not blame just plain Congressmen on the Committee of Expenditures in the State Department for wanting to know how much and to whom the money was paid. Our colleague, Mr. MCFADDEN, of that committee, addressed a letter to Mr. R. C. Leffingwell, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, asking for a statement of money paid out under his direction. This official had testified before the committee, page 88:

It was arranged that no withdrawals should be made from that account without first notifying the Treasury and ascertaining whether it objected to the particular disbursement proposed.

This was in harmony with the evidence of Secretary Polk. Very properly our State and Treasury Departments were bound to see that this money was paid to American contractors, and they adopted a plan they did not adopt with any real ambassador. In other words, he has never been recognized as an ambassador and he is not now and has not been an ambassador since the fall of the Kerensky government.

Therefore I was naturally surprised when I read Mr. Leffingwell's answer to Mr. McFadden's letter. He addressed Mr. ELLIOTT, chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department:

The Treasury does not feel, therefore, that it can allow the confidential information, which it obtained from those Governments in a spirit of cooperation and mutual confidence, to be made public, or made the basis of what would in effect be an indirect investigation of their affairs such as no committee of Congress would, I assume, desire to have power to conduct directly.

In other words, put the Secretary of the Treasury on the stand—

Q. Was Bakhmeteff ambassador when, after the fall of his government, you compelled him to get your O. K. before he checked out money from the City National Bank?—A. Oh, no; if he had been we could not have made this requirement.

Q. Was he ambassador when he paid out that American money on your O. K.?—A. Oh, yes; it was done in a spirit of mutual confidence, and because he was an ambassador it would not be safe to allow the American Congress to know the facts.

Mr. Speaker, it is time to speak the truth. Dr. Dillon, in his most valuable book, The Inside Story of the Peace Conference, says, speaking of the peace commissioners:

Without chart or compass they drifted in strange and sterile courses, beginning with the Prinkipo incident and ending with the * * * Kolchak incident, in order to legalize international relations which could not be truly described as peace or war.

If we are at war with Russia, our declaration should be broad enough to make peace. If we are not at war, it can do no harm to felicitate ourselves that we are at "peace with all the world."

I want to go back to the old American home, the old American doctrine. I remember when I was a boy—and there was a bunch of 10 of us—sometimes at night when the storm would come and it was dark our good mother would call us in and shut the door and leave the storm and darkness on the outside. She left one curtain up to light our friends and neighbors that passed by on the village street, as our Constitution and our declaration have been a beacon light to light those people who wished to emulate us in the matter of self-government.

We were away there in the storm. I want my country to get back to where it was. I want the doors closed. I want my children and my grandchildren to get out of the storm of war and jealousies and the contemptible conspiracies of the kings, the mikados, the czars, and the kaisers. [Applause on the Republican side.] And the only way to do it is to help to make peace. I want to get around that old table with this old Constitution that we all want to follow as a guide to our politics and the old Bible as a guide to our conscience. Away from the storms and the policies and the crimes of other countries, around that old family fireside, we will take a new oath of allegiance to this Constitution and dedicate ourselves anew and yet anew to the interest of this country—the best country in the world. [Loud applause on the Republican side, the Members rising.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished Democratic leader, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], asked those of us who had introduced measures to repeal war-time statutes to hold up our hands. We did so. I want also to lift my voice. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for advertising my speech in favor of the League of Nations.

Mr. KITCHIN. It never would have been heard of otherwise. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. Oh, the gentleman and I have a working agreement. I praise very properly the best speech made against the declaration of war, which he made, next to mine, and he now praises my speech in favor of the League of Nations. [Laughter.] But I want you gentlemen to look at the date when the speech was made, and I recommend you all to read it. I know it is a good speech—I made it myself. I have not a word to take back, but I made it before I ever dreamed of a proposition for a league of nations that would be produced having the provisions that this has. Show me one line in that speech, or anywhere, where I have announced myself in favor of giving Great Britain 6 votes to our 1. Show one line in that speech where I stood in favor of allowing any other power in the world to order my country into war, except the Congress of the United States. Show me one word whereby I yielded any of those American doctrines, and I will apologize to my children and grandchildren for having done so.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. Oh, the gentleman knows I can not yield in two minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. But the gentleman asked us to show him and I want to read it to him.

Mr. MASON. Out of my two minutes I can not yield to the gentleman, but I recommend the gentleman to read my speech and commit it to memory, and say it at night before he goes to bed—it will do him good. But I can not allow the gentleman to interrupt me in my two minutes, and I am simply answering this proposition. I say that I am in favor of a league of peace, and I have not said anything against it. I believe in international arbitration, and I worked and fought for it in this House 32 years ago, but if ever I saw the time when I would stand for a league of nations that would give 6 votes to Great Britain and 1 to us, I will have to apologize to the gentleman and to everyone else.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY].

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am tremendously opposed to the passage of this resolution or any resolution like it. I do not know of any proposition that has come before Congress in the seven years that I have been a Member to which I have been so much opposed as I am to the proposition now before the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Gentlemen, what does this resolution propose? It is a proposition to make a separate peace with Germany. If the President of the United States at the conclusion of the war had said that he was going to make a peace with Germany separate and distinct from the peace to be made with the nations with whom we were associated, he would not have had a single vote of support or confidence on either side of this Chamber. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This idea of a separate peace with Germany is not a new proposition. This idea of a separate peace with Germany has been floating about Congress for months. More than one partial poll of this House has been made to determine whether or not there was sentiment enough to back up such a proposition. Here is the situation: The great mass of the people of America, in Congress and out of Congress, have wanted this peace when it was made to be in conjunction with the nations with whom we were associated in the war. At the other end of the Capitol not more than a dozen Senators have taken the other position—that the peace should be a separate peace. Mr. Speaker, we want to consider pretty carefully what we are doing here. More than 80 Senators have voted to ratify a treaty signed by all of the allied nations, and about a dozen have voted in season and out of season against such a treaty, either with or without reservations.

If you pass this resolution here to-day, the interpretation which the country and the world will put upon it—of course not what is intended here—will be that this House has approved the course of those who have stood against the treaty in the Senate, with or without reservations, and in favor of a separate peace, and it will be regarded as a repudiation of the position taken by those Senators who favored the ratification of the treaty either in its original form or with reservations. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; I have not the time. Furthermore, I want to call particular attention to the fact that it is idle to hope for an early vote or passage of this resolution in the Senate, with 49 Republicans and 47 Democrats in that body. What man is there here so inexperienced as to think that a two-thirds vote can be obtained in the Senate for a cloture rule to ever bring this resolution to a vote in that body?

It will be over there, if it is ever reported out of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as a bone of contention, taking up the time of the Senate of this country until the clock strikes 12 on election day. That is what is likely to happen. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. How about the Michigan election?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If the gentleman wants to take the position that he favors a separate peace with Germany, I am perfectly willing that he should do so, but as for myself I refuse to do it [applause on the Democratic side], and that is why I am stating to the House why I am opposed to this resolution.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The gentleman is not speaking to me.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. All my life long whenever I have taken a decided position upon a question, as I have in this case, I have endeavored to give the reason why I have taken that position. That is what I am doing now. Now, irrespective of what happens to this resolution after it leaves here, I hear men say, "Why, if it is a proper thing to do, let us perform our duty and let other people take care of theirs." That is right. And that brings me directly to the merits of this resolution. This is a resolution to make a separate peace with Germany without terms. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Section 3 provides that if we have any rights under the armistice we shall continue to enjoy those rights, and section 5—perhaps I have got the sections twisted about—provides that Germany shall not set up any claim under this resolution which she could not set up under the treaty. But outside of that the proposed resolution makes peace with Germany without terms, without pledges, and without guaranties of any kind, shape, or description.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. I will yield the gentleman—how much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Can the gentleman give me 10 minutes more?

Mr. FLOOD. I will yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlemen from Michigan is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, if any man had said while the war was in progress that when the war was over he would be willing to make a separate peace with Germany without terms or without guaranties as to the restoration of Belgium or France, he would not have been safe in any community in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What change has taken place that we should propose such a thing now?

By this resolution we say, in effect, to Germany, "The war is over; let bygones be bygones; let us shake hands and call it square; it is all over, and, besides, we want to trade with you." [Laughter on the Democratic side.] We ask them to make no promises or guaranties as to their military policy; we do not even inquire of them as to how large an army they are going to maintain, or how large a navy they are going to keep up, or what their relations are to be with Russia, Poland, Belgium, or any of the new nations that are set up over there. We seem to wash our hands completely of all interest in or responsibility for what may happen in Europe. And why? According to the resolution in order that we may "secure reciprocal trade with the German Government." [Laughter on the Democratic side.] If we were really going to do a thing like that I would not have written it in the bill, in any event, where all the world can read it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] This resolution is so absolutely inconsistent with everything that this great Republic has done from the time we entered the war up to this time that it seems too bad that we should mar our record. As a Republican, I would much prefer to let our record stand as it has been made on this question. I would much prefer to stand where the Republicans of the Senate have placed us as a party, for the treaty with suitable reservations to protect the sovereignty and political independence of America against any encroachments from the outside. We would have had the treaty ratified in that form if the President of the United States had been willing that it should go through; the responsibility for failure to ratify is his; the record of the Republican Senate is clear and straight; let the issue be fought as made in the Senate; let us not confuse it with this resolution. Now, this is a new and strange attitude for us to take on the Republican side of the Chamber. Only a year or so ago one of the distinguished Republican leaders of this country laid down the correct doctrine, in my judgment, for Republicans and Democrats alike to follow upon the conclusion of the war.

He did not seem to think that it was our place to cut ourselves off from the allied nations and make a separate peace with Germany without terms. Oh, they say we can negotiate a treaty afterwards, but it is a fine thing to give a man a receipt in full and then tell him to come back and settle afterwards. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Here is what a great Republican statesman uttered only a year or so ago, and he blazed the correct pathway for this country to take at the conclusion of this war. He said:

> The United States occupies, fortunately, a position in which she will be able to speak with a powerful voice.

Oh, this is a powerful voice, this resolution. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

He said:

> We seek no territory; no material gain for our own country. There is no territory by which we could be bribed or influenced; no trade advantage by which we could be tempted.

He could not have even dreamed of this resolution, which recites "in order that we may have reciprocal trade with the German Government." [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Continuing, he said:

> There is no personal profit which can turn us from the one great object. Our sole purpose is to put Germany finally and completely in a position where she can never again attempt to conquer and ruin the world, as she has done in the last four years.

That is what a great Republican statesman said only a few months ago. I stand by every word of it, and commend it to my colleagues on both sides of the Chamber.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. What was the date?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. August, 1918. Again, in order that there should be no question about that or that America should take its proper place in the settlement of this Great War, he went on to say that we must see to it that Belgium must be restored. What does this resolution say about restoring Belgium? Nothing. I can not so soon forget that Belgium threw herself across the path of the world's despoiler and held the lines till France could arrive.

I for one refuse to forget the services which Belgium rendered to mankind. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This great Republican leader and statesman further declared:

> Alsace and Lorraine must be returned.
> Italia Irredenta must go back to Italy.
> Serbia and Roumania must be established in their independence.
> Greece must be more secure.
> The Jugoslovakia and Czechoslovakia must be independent States.
> The Polish people must have an independent Poland.
> The Russian Provinces must be restored.
> Constantinople must be taken away from Turkey.
> Palestine must never be returned to Turkish rule.
> There must be compensation to Belgium, and a partial compensation at least can be found in the disposition of the German colonies, which ought never to be returned to the empire which has so abused all the most ordinary rights of humanity. These in outline are the principal conditions—

He says:

> What conditions are in this resolution? None.

Continuing—

> which alone will give us a victory worth having, and when we talk about a complete peace, and a just and righteous peace, let it be known to all the world that that is what we mean.

I adopt as my own the language and sentiment of this great leader.

Those are the words of a great Republican statesman, the Republican leader of the Senate, HENRY CABOT LODGE. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the record we have made on this question, and I propose to stand there, and not upon the record that we will make here this afternoon.

Men, I do not want to claim your attention further. Just one word in conclusion.

I believe that for the present, until the conditions in the world settle down, we had better stand with the nations with whom we stood in war in this matter of peace with Germany. Men sometimes declare pretty glibly that they do not care what happens to Europe. Why, the failure of a single banking house in Europe precipitated one of the great panics of America. My Republican colleagues, our record is perfectly clear.

We stand for the treaty as it is written and as it has been safeguarded by the Republican Members of the Senate. When the time comes that a sufficient number of Democratic Senators will join us in the ratification of the treaty so safeguarded we will be at peace under a joint treaty entered into by us and the allied governments. In the meantime let us not confuse ourselves or the world by passing this resolution. Let us adhere to the course we have so wisely followed up to this hour, and then no man or nation can ever truthfully say that this great Republic, within 18 months after the signing of the armistice and before the grass had grown a second time over the graves of our dead in France, held out the friendly hand to Germany saying, "Shake hands; call it square. It is all over; we want to trade with you." Others may do as they please; but, gentlemen, it will never be done with my vote. [Loud applause on the Democratic side, the Members rising.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, our Democratic friends are very much concerned because the Republican Members of the House have determined to make an effort to end the anomalous condition which exists in the country to-day with respect to the duration of the war. While everybody admits that the war is over in the sense that hostilities have ceased and that Germany has no intention of resuming them against us, nevertheless it is asserted that a technical state of war exists, because peace has not been formally established, and this technical state of war is given as an excuse for the continuance of war activities, which impose a great burden of expense upon the people and prevent American citizens from enjoying trade relations with the present German Government and its nationals.

The people of this country want peace declared. They want normal conditions restored. My own view has been that a majority of our citizens wanted the treaty ratified after American interests had been fully protected under the Lodge reservations. I confess to some doubt about it, now that presidential primaries have expressed a preference for antileague candidates. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is only one reason why that could not and can not be done. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] stated in the course of his remarks on the rule that the only living ex-President of the United States favored the League of Nations, but I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that ex-President Taft stated that the only thing which prevented the ratification of the treaty with the League of Nations covenant was the stubbornness of the present occupant of the White House. In view of the fact, which is recognized by every Member of Congress, that there is no prospect during the life of the present administration to secure ratification of the treaty, it becomes the paramount duty of Congress to take any justifiable means to establish a condition of peace, in order that all doubt on this question may be set at rest by a formal declaration, and that commercial relations may be resumed with the present German Government and its nationals.

Of course, our Democratic friends must find some excuse for voting against this resolution. They must find some excuse for taking action which they know is contrary to the wishes of the vast majority of people in practically every congressional district in the United States, and so they seek to take refuge under an alleged constitutional objection. They contend for this purpose that the adoption of the joint resolution is an invasion of the treaty-making power, which the Constitution vests in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In order to demonstrate the unsoundness of this contention it is only necessary to consider the nature of a treaty.

There are many definitions in the Federal reports, but they all agree that a treaty is a contract or agreement negotiated in the first instance by the plenipotentiaries or commissioners of sovereign States and subsequently ratified by the sovereign authority of such States.

Taking up section 1 of the joint resolution, we find a simple declaration that the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States by joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end. There is certainly no element of any contract or agreement in this section. It is a simple declaration on our part only that we formally recognize the existence of a state of facts which everybody knows to be true.

The authorities on international law, and this is solely a question of international law, state there are three ways of ending a war; first, by a treaty of peace; second, by the complete subjugation of the enemy; and third, by a long-continued cessation of hostilities without intention of resumption, that States may glide imperceptibly into a state of peace with each other without any formal action. It might be well argued that there is another way in which peace may come, unless it be considered a variation of the second, namely, where the enemy with which we were at war no longer exists. Our declaration was against the Imperial German Government. It might well therefore be argued that when the Imperial German Government passed out of existence the war declared against it automatically came to a close. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Of course, it is true that this declaration does not bind Germany. It is simply a declaration upon the part of the United States that so far as we are concerned the war is over, that we are quit of it and do not intend to resume it. To contend that such a declaration is an invasion of the treaty-making power, that it involves the formation of a contract or agreement with another Nation, is a palpable absurdity.

Section 2 is clearly constitutional as an exercise of legislative authority. The power which originally fixed the date for the termination of war emergency legislation can certainly change the date whenever it sees fit to do so, and that is all that would be accomplished by this section.

Section 3 provides for the resumption of trade relations with the German Government and its nationals unler certain specified conditions. The Constitution of the United States expressly vests in Congress the authority to regulate trade with foreign nations. Having that authority, it is certainly competent to specify the conditions under which we will permit our people to trade with another nation, whether it is one with which we have been at war or one with which we have been at peace. The section provides that our nationals may engage in such trade unless Germany fails within a specified number of days to declare peace with the United States, and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals certain claims and demands. This is clearly no exercise of treaty-making power. There is here present no element of any contract or agreement. If Congress has the right to regulate trade with foreign nations it certainly follows as an inescapable conclusion that it has the right to impose the conditions under which such trade is permitted to her citizens, and the condition here is that Germany shall show to the United States a fair and friendly attitude. We could not afford to permit such trade if that were not done.

Section 4 merely provides penalties for a violation of the prohibition contained in section 3. The constitutionality of this section is frankly admitted in the general statement contained in the minority report.

Section 5 provides that nothing in this resolution shall be construed as a waiver of any of our rights under the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or which were acquired by the United States during the war, and ratifies, confirms, and maintains all fines, forfeitures, and seizures imposed by the United States. It is simply a declaration of the American purpose with respect to these matters, which, in my opinion, is not strictly necessary but which is entirely proper in order that no doubt may be entertained by anybody as to our attitude in respect thereto.

The enactment of this joint resolution will, of course, largely fail of its purpose unless Germany declares peace with the United States. I have no doubt but that she will promptly take such action, as it is manifestly in her interest to do so. If Germany should declare peace with the United States after the enactment of this resolution and within the time specified therein, then the two nations, each acting for itself, having declared a state of peace to exist, the technical state of war would end without treaty of peace, and trade relations could be resumed.

I regret to say that I fear this happy consummation will be defeated by the action of the President of the United States. I am satisfied he will veto this resolution for the purpose of attempting to coerce the Senate of the United States into compliance with his views in the matter of the covenant of the League of Nations. This attempt will fail, as all previous attempts have failed. The Republican Senate will not sacrifice the sovereignty and freedom of action of the United States at the request of President Wilson or of anybody else, and so the present unfortunate and highly undesirable relationship in which we stand with the German Government and its nationals in all probability will be continued for some time to come, until we have another occupant of the White House or the force of public opinion changes the attitude of the Democratic Members of Congress, who are to-day upholding the President in his desire to thwart the will of the people of the United States. But whether this joint resolution is vetoed or not, the Republicans in Congress will have performed their duty in effecting its passage, and the sole responsibility will be upon the Democratic administration for preventing the restoration of peace and the return to normal conditions. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with the utmost attention to the speeches that have been made upon this resolution ever since the beginning of the debate, and it seems to me that those who have addressed themselves to this subject upon the other side of the House are guilty of begging the question. If anyone here is at a loss for argument in support of this resolution he can find in the minority report, presented by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], plenty of ground to justify affirmative action. On page 13 of that report I find the following language:

> It is a fact that every war in which the United States has been engaged has been concluded by a treaty of peace, except the war between the States, which was an internal conflict.

There is no doubt as to the correctness of this statement, but the point to remember is that the war through which the country has recently passed has not been brought to a close by a treaty of peace, and though several attempts have been made to conclude it in that way it has been entirely impossible to do so. Let me say, moreover, that present indications show that the peace treaty, either with or without reservations, will not be ratified for some time to come, if, indeed, it is to be ratified at all. In consequence of this situation the pending resolution comes before the House from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a committee on which I have had the honor to serve during the past six years. I am one of those who assisted in the framing of this resolution. I voted to report this resolution to the House. I shall vote for its passage to-day, and I am free to say that I can see no reason whatever for any difference of opinion upon it.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House ask for precedents that will justify the passage of this measure. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] only a few moments ago, in the course of his speech, defied anyone to show a precedent which will warrant the passage of a treaty by the House of Representatives. This proposed legislation is not a treaty. I deny that it partakes of the character of a treaty. The gentleman from Arkansas and his colleagues may call it a treaty if they desire, but to do so furnishes no plausible excuse for opposition to the resolution. No one here makes the claim that the House of Representatives has a right to pass a treaty of peace or any other kind of a treaty. The precise question before the House is, What can Congress do in view of the situation which confronts this country at the present hour? What is that situation? One year and a half has already passed since the war came to a close, but no treaty has yet been ratified by the United States. We are therefore technically in a state of war which will continue indefinitely unless something is done to declare the war at an end. In the face of this condition you gentlemen on the other side of the House ask for precedents. I maintain that it is impossible to present a precedent for an unprecedented situation. The fact is that the country demands this legislation in order to declare the war at an end and to repeal certain wartime and emergency legislation which is out of date and oppressive, and from which the country has long since been clamoring for relief.

Section 1 of the pending resolution declares that the war is at an end. This is a declaration of fact well known to every person in the country. This section is attacked by our friends on the other side of the House on the ground that it is unconstitutional. How, I ask, can the mere declaration of a fact in any way violate the Constitution? But you say to declare the war at an end is to make a treaty of peace, a power which Congress does not possess. This argument is a mere subterfuge and if you gentlemen make it sincerely then I submit that your position is entirely illogical. And why?

I heard the speech of a distinguished leader of the other side of the House in the course of which he said, "Why don't you come in here with a straightforward resolution to repeal this war-time legislation and we on this side of the House will support it"? I call attention here to the fact that before the war-time legislation can be repealed, either in the manner provided in this bill or in the manner suggested by the distinguished gentleman, you on the other side of this House will have to admit that the war is at an end, for otherwise there would be no reason for such repeal. But you deny that the war is at an end when you oppose section 1 of this resolution. If, as you contend, the war is not at an end, how could you support your proposition to repeal the war-time legislation when such repeal must necessarily be predicated upon the plain fact that the war has terminated and that there is consequently no further need of the war-time legislation?

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the country desires this legislation which we are considering, and that it is the duty of this House to pass it without further delay, regardless of whether or not our action in so doing is acceptable to the occupant of the White House, who is loath to let go that control which was granted him by Congress in organizing the Nation for war. War legislation is oppressive in time of peace. Congress has the power to repeal it and the right to exercise that power in the manner which this resolution proposes.

Section 3 of the pending resolution provides for the resumption of reciprocal trade relations between Germany and the United States. This section says, in a word, that unless Germany within a given time shall notify the President that it has declared a termination of the war, and has made the waivers and renouncements on behalf of itself and its nationals as therein specified, commercial intercourse, and so forth, shall, except with the license of the President, be prohibited. Gentlemen also deny that section 3 is constitutional. Let us see whether or not their position is tenable. For myself, I am frank in saying that if the plan or purpose of this section were to open up negotiations with Germany concerning trade, if this section in any way held out an offer by this Government on the one hand and an acceptance thereof by Germany on the other, it might then be regarded as an attempt on the part of Congress to assume and exercise functions which under the Constitution belong to the President and the Senate of the United States. But this section does not propose any plan or purpose of negotiation. It is not a proposition of offer and acceptance. There is nothing in it which entitles Germany to set up any modifications or counter modifications; nothing, moreover, which even suggests regulation by compromise or compact; and nothing, therefore, which lays claim to the exercise of a power which does not belong to this House.

A treaty requires action on the part of two independent nations comprising mutual agreements in regard to the terms and stipulations set forth in the instrument itself. A close examination of section 3 of this measure leads to the conclusion that it does not propose mutual action or submit any terms that are based upon interchange between the United States and Germany. It leaves it entirely to Germany herself to decide whether or not she wishes to restore trade relations with us. Section 3, therefore, does not carry us beyond the power which is clearly ours—the power given by the Constitution to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

The pending resolution bears its credentials on its face. It is not a treaty, but rather legislation to be applied municipally without consultation with Germany. Hence there is no usurpation here—no exercise of the treaty-making faculty—and, this being the case, it follows that our action in passing this resolution is entirely consistent with the authority vested in this House by the organic law of the country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee I felt myself under the obligation to convince myself that I had the right to not only vote this resolution out of the committee but to vote for it upon the floor of the House. I am not an international lawyer; in fact, I am not a lawyer at all. When I heard the silver-tongued orator from the State of Texas, whom I admire greatly, expound the doctrine that this is unconstitutional, I wavered somewhat in my allegiance to my former conviction, but I was reassured by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who in support of it advanced irrefutable logic. So I again take my place as one willing to support this resolution, fully believing that I am not violating the Constitution when I do so.

International law has no particular appeal to the people of the United States at this time upon this question. In fact, if one is to judge by the result in Michigan and several other States, international alliances have no particular appeal to the people of the United States just now. [Applause.]

Undoubtedly the resolution will pass. Whether it will muster a two-thirds vote of the House when it comes back, vetoed by the President, is another matter. That question is not important at present. Nor is it of the first importance now whether the resolution is a proper one for the House to consider, despite the length of argument upon that issue. The matter which is of first importance and which is urgent is that this country shall achieve somehow a peace status. [Applause.]

We have proclaimed ours to be a peace-loving Nation upon every occasion offered and in every quarter open to our eloquence. We have confessed our horror of war upon every opportunity. Yet for 17 months we have clung desperately to a war that is over. For 17 months we have puttered at peace making—puttered at it without getting anywhere. We were chided for our reluctance to get into the war, possibly with justice. But the critic does not live who can accuse us of unseemly haste in getting out of it. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, if we are a peace-loving people it is time for us to prove it. If we do hate war, let us get rid of one that was finished long ago. [Applause.] We are in an impossible situation. Unanimously we say we want a state of peace. Every interest in our land beseeches it; trade languishes without it; industry is hobbled by the restrictions of war and we fret under them ourselves as individuals; we know that we can make no substantial progress, that we can neither plan for the future nor fulfill the obligations of the present, until peace is attained.

Unanimously, also, we say that we are a self-governing people. But for 17 months we have withheld from ourselves the thing we want. None but ourselves intervenes between us and a state of peace. None but ourselves inflicts a state of war upon us. We said, justly, that the war was forced upon us. Is that why we defy all the powers of earth to force us into a state of peace? It is a safe defiance. Other powers do not much care whether we remain in a state of war or not. If they did care, we would never let them force peace upon us, because we are self-governing and can run our own affairs; that is, we say we can.

I myself believe we can. I hold fast to what now seems the absurd theory that we are self-governing. That is why I am going to vote for the pending resolution; why I am not much concerned with the arguments for and against the right of the House to consider this matter.

If we are a governed people at all there is, of necessity, some road which will lead us from a state of war to one of peace. We who are not lawyers are told by those who are that there is such a road—plain and direct, wide open and main traveled. That is theory. In fact, the road is blocked. The American people know it is blocked, because they have not been able to pursue it to the peace they desire.

We know it is blocked, because we have seen some of the obstructions set up.

What are we going to do about it? It has been blocked for 17 months. None is removing the obstructions; rather, they are being piled higher. Shall we, then, stand still and wait for the removal of these obstructions by the corrosion of time? Or shall we try to find a way around? The pressure of the American people, of business, of industry, of husbandry, and of morality is behind us. If we stand and wait, that pressure will become heavier than some of us can bear. Hence, I believe we will be wise if we try to go around. That is what this resolution seeks to do—to find a way around. And in this there is none to complain except those who have helped to block the main-traveled road.

It is claimed here that peacemaking is not our job; that there are those who are specifically charged with this duty. Grant that this is true—what does it get us? These others have failed. It is not our fault, and it is not the fault of the people, that they have been heedless of duty. We are concerned only with the fact. It is because they have failed that this House is constrained to act. A thing is to be done. If the agency specifically charged with its performance fails to do it, the answer is, not to leave the thing undone but to find another agency. We are a futile people, and this is a futile legislature if we can not accomplish this.

I hope the resolution before the House will achieve this end. I wish that resolution were broader; that it included all the nations with which we have been at war—Austria, if there is an Austria, and Hungary, if there is a Hungary—so that we might be at peace with all the world. For that is the great end to be sought. Hate has been loose in the world for nearly six years. It is time for the cultivation of good will. We are not cultivating good will by clinging to the fiction of a war that has passed into history. We are neither cultivating good will nor serving our people by trying to fix the blame for blocking the road to peace. The only way in which we can render service is by bringing to our country the peace we have won; by restoring to our people the right to plan their lives and conduct their affairs upon a basis of good fellowship with all the world. Because we hope this resolution will do that, we ask, in the name of common sense, that it shall be passed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken at 5.30 o'clock instead of at 5 o'clock, as provided in the rule. I make this request because gentlemen on both sides have urged additional time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time for taking the vote be changed from 5 o'clock to 5.30 o'clock p. m. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the additional time I take it will be equally divided between each side?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the chairman of the committee, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I listened to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], and if his speech had been made a year and a half ago, during the pendency of the war, I would have heartily agreed with him. No one, while we were in war, wanted to make a separate peace with our enemies, but the conditions are entirely different to-day. To-day all of our allies, in fact all of the world, are at peace with Germany and the Central Powers, except the United States. That is the difference. They have made their treaties, and their rights are determined. That treaty stands to-day, and we can ratify it at any time. The passage of this resolution does not in the least preclude us from ratifying the treaty when it is presented to us and we are given an American treaty and proper reservations safeguarding American rights are accepted by the President, who has certainly shown great arbitrariness in this matter.

The President himself has emphasized the fact that it is necessary to have peace, necessary not only for the people of the United States, but for the world, for this country to be at peace, but because we can not enter into a peace that he wants he stands back and prevents us from being at peace on any other terms. He refuses to modify his views in the least, although a large majority of the Senate, representing a constituency of more than three-fourths of the people of the country, ask for fair and reasonable reservations.

The constitutional question has been fought out here very carefully, and I do not think there is much doubt in anyone's mind who has listened to the arguments, and is unprejudiced by partisanship, but that we have a constitutional right to declare a fact that we know exists, that this war is at an end. I believe we therefore have the right to officially declare the war is at an end. It is an elementary principle that any legislative body has a right to repeal any act or resolution that it has the right to pass. I think that at any time, from a day to a year after war was declared, Congress had the right to repeal the resolution declaring war, and that when that repeal resolution passed both houses and was signed by the President, the war would have been at an end.

EFFECT OF RESOLUTION.

The passage of this resolution will give us peace and will repeal over 60 war measures, many of which are oppressive to the people and which give the President extraordinary powers never intended to be exercised by the Executive in times of peace.

In arguing for the support of this resolution declaring that the war is at an end, there are two propositions to establish: First. Has Congress the authority under the Constitution to pass this resolution? Second. If Congress has the authority, is it for the best interest of the people of the United States that Congress exercise that authority?

This resolution does not contemplate the making of a treaty. I do not contend for a moment that Congress could pass a resolution that was broad enough in its scope to cover the subject matter that would naturally be embraced in a treaty. I do maintain, however, that Congress has a clear right under the authorities that I will cite to declare that the war, which is in fact at an end, is officially at an end. The war between the United States and the Imperial German Government came to an end November 11, 1918. There was a complete cessation of hostilities between the United States and Germany on that date.

Germany at that time signed an armistice which was a complete surrender, and in compliance with that armistice turned over her navy to the Allies, also her guns and munitions of war, demobilized her armies, and made it absolutely physically impossible in every way for her to carry on the war. The President officially laid these facts before Congress November 11, 1918, when he appeared before a joint session of Congress and presented the terms of the armistice. The first sentence of President Wilson's message to Congress in presenting the armistice was as follows:

> The war thus comes to an end, for, having accepted these terms of armistice, it will be impossible for the German command to renew it.

Several times in that message the President reiterated the fact that the war is at an end. Notwithstanding that the war, in fact, came to an end November 11, 1918, over 17 months ago; notwithstanding that all the nations of Europe are at peace with Germany and have established friendly trade relations with her, the United States is still at war with Germany.

John Bassett Moore, as high authority on international law as we have, states:

> Peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made.

He states further:

> History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace must be determined in each case with reference to collateral facts and circumstances. (Vol. —, p. 336, sec. 1163.)

Oppenheim, another great authority on international law, holds that peace may be established in the following way, to wit:

> The normal condition between two States being peace, war can never be more than a temporary condition; whatever may have been the cause or the causes of a war, the latter can naturally not last forever.
> A war may be terminated in three different ways: Beligerents may, first, abstain from further acts of war and glide into peaceful relations without expressly making peace through a special treaty; or, secondly, belligerents may formally establish the condition of peace between each other through a special treaty of peace; or, thirdly, a belligerent may end the war through subjugation of his adversary. (See Phillimore, International Law, vol. 3, p. 772.)
> There appear to be three ways by which war may be concluded and peace restored: First, by a de facto cessation of hostilities on the part of both belligerents and a renewal de facto of the relations of peace; second, by the unconditional submission of one belligerent to another; third, by the conclusion of a formal treaty of peace between belligerents.
> A formal declaration on the part of the belligerents that war has ceased, however usual and desirable, can not be said to be absolutely necessary for the restoration of peace. War may silently cease and peace be silently renewed. So ended the war between Sweden and Poland in the year 1716.

Grotius, in his Rights of War and Peace, holds as follows (p. 286):

> The person who has authority to begin a war has the authority to make peace.

It is inconceivable that the framers of our Constitution would place the power of declaring war in the hands of the Congress and deny them the right of repealing that law and thus making peace.

It is conceded by all that Congress could at any stage of the war put an end to war by refusing to make the necessary appropriations for carrying on the war. If Congress has the power indirectly to stop a war, it would certainly have the power to repeal a statute declaring war.

There seems to be much confusion over the question of Congress declaring that a state of war no longer exists and the right of Congress to make a treaty of peace. The right to make a treaty of peace or any kind of treaty is expressly delegated by the Constitution to the President with the advice and consent and the right of confirmation by the Senate.

The question of making a treaty is not involved here. The question is, "Congress having passed a resolution declaring war, has Congress the right to repeal that resolution?"

Objection is made to section 3 of the resolution, that it attempts to confer legislative powers on the President and is in effect a treaty.

Section 3 of the resolution, authorizing the President to secure reciprocal trade with the German Government and its nationals and requiring the German Government to declare a termination of the war with the United States, is clearly within the Constitution, and sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649). All the embargo statutes follow this decision. The President was given the authority by Congress to place an embargo on all our ammunitions going to Mexico. This embargo has, at the discretion of President Wilson, been withdrawn and then made operative by the President at various times during his administration. The same identical language used in the McKinley law and sustained in Field against Clark is used in this resolution. This decision, therefore, settles the constitutionality of this part of the resolution.

Congress having clearly the power to say that the war is at an end, I maintain it is for the best interest of the people of the United States to declare that the war is at an end.

REPEAL OF WAR MEASURES.

This resolution repeals the so-called war legislation which was to terminate at the end of the war. It repeals the pernicious and tyrannical espionage act that makes the Postmaster General the censor of what 100,000,000 people can read or send through the mails and gives him the right to exclude any paper or magazine from the mails without giving its publisher a hearing or an appeal from his decision. Under the "trading-with-the-enemy act" now on our statute books, our merchants and manufacturers are not permitted to trade with Germany. Her people can not exchange their products for ours, or buy our products, or carry on commerce with this country, or the people of this country can not trade with them unless the President issues a special license. Thus our trade relations are very much restricted. This act and many others will be repealed by this resolution. A vote against this resolution is a vote in favor of retaining these and the other war measures on our statute books.

England, France, Belgium, and Italy are at peace with the Central Powers. They are taking advantage of this embarrassing position of the United States and are building up their trade with Germany at our expense.

OUR EXPORTS FALLING OFF.

Our exports fell off very greatly in February and still greater in March. With the present deadlock between the Senate and the President on the treaty and the League of Nations, there is not the remotest possibility of an agreement before the coming in of a new Congress and new President, March 4, 1921.

Can this Congress sit by complacently and keep a resolution on the statute books stating that a state of war exists when in reality it does not exist and has not existed for over 17 months? Does this Congress want to take the responsibility of permitting our great commercial rivals, England, France, Italy, and Japan, to take advantage of our being at war with Germany while they are at peace with her and permit these nations to take the trade our people formerly had with Germany? Do the people want the President to retain these extraordinary war powers in times of peace?

This Congress can not be accused of acting hastily in passing a resolution like the one under consideration. I think we have been overpatient, and our patience has long since ceased to be a virtue. The American people have also been patient. They have seen our commercial rivals getting the trade that belonged to us before the war, and have waited for the President and the Senate to act. They now demand that something be done to place us on a peace status, and they earnestly petition the House of Representatives, the people's popular branch of the Government, to act.

Take President Wilson's own words, as to the necessity of an immediate peace, in his address before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, August 19, 1919:

The nations that ratify the treaty, such as Great Britain, Belgium, and France, will be in a position to lay their plans for controlling the markets of Central Europe without competition from us, if we do not presently act. We have no consular agents, no trade representatives there to look after our interests.

There are large areas of Europe whose future will lie uncertain and questionable until their people know the final settlements of peace and the forces which are to administer and sustain it. Without determinate markets our production can not proceed with intelligence or confidence. There can be no stabilization of wages, because there can be no settled conditions of employment; there can be no easy or normal industrial credits because there can be no confident and permanent revival of business.

The President further states:

But I will not weary you with obvious examples. I will only venture to repeat that every element of normal life amongst us depends upon and awaits the ratification of the treaty of peace.

President Wilson, in a speech at Billings, Mont., September 11, 1919, emphasizes the necessity of an early peace in these words:

In order, therefore, to straighten out the affairs of America, in order to calm and correct the ways of the world, the first and important requisite is peace, and it is an important requisite that can not wait. It is not wise to wait.

THE PEOPLE WANT PEACE.

All agree that it is very important that we have peace. Peace will stabilize industry, restore confidence, and hasten our return to normal conditions. The business men of the country, the producers, and the laboring men are all anxious to return at once to our normal condition, which we only can do by terminating the war, repealing war legislation, and becoming once more a Government by the people and for the people, and not a Government by the President alone.

Germany is not in the League of Nations. There is no reason why Germany and the United States can not make peace at once and resume trade relations. It would surely be for the mutual benefit of the United States and Germany. This resolution will not only stabilize conditions in the United States but in the world.

Can anyone give us the slightest assurance that President Wilson will ever consent to a peace except on the basis of a League of Nations, as he insists upon it without reservation made by a majority of the Senate, which majority represents a constituency of over three-fourths of the American people? With the urgent necessity of an immediate peace, with the dire results that are bound to happen unless we have peace at the earliest possible time, as set forth by the President himself in his speeches that I have quoted from, how long must the people wait because of the arbitrary action of one man?

"HE KEPT US OUT OF WAR."

This was the slogan of the Democratic Party four years ago. November 6, 1916, on the eve of the election, the following advertisement appeared:

You are working, not fighting; alive and happy, not cannon fodder. Wilson with peace with honor or Hughes with Roosevelt and war?
The lesson is plain; if you want war, vote for Hughes. If you want peace with honor, vote for Wilson.

Can President Wilson or the Democratic Party go before the people in the coming presidential campaign, almost two years after the cessation of hostilities and the laying down of arms, under the slogan "We are still at war," when they as a party opposed a resolution officially declaring, what is an indisputable fact, that the war is at an end?

USURPATION OF POWER.

Some of the Democratic members of the Foreign Affairs Committee seemed to be very apprehensive of the legislative branch of this Government encroaching on the powers of the executive branch of the Government. They opposed the bill providing for a convention to consider questions relating to international communication on the grounds that the provision in the bill that the appointees of the President be confirmed by the Senate was trenching on the President's powers and was therefore unconstitutional. This bill passed by a large majority, notwithstanding the arguments of the gentlemen opposing it.

When the same bill came before the Senate, where it was scrutinized by the ablest constitutional lawyers in the country of both parties, with the elaborate minority report of my Democratic friends in the House in their hands, not one Senator raised his voice against it or claimed that it was unconstitutional.

Therefore I am led to believe that my Democratic friends are unnecessarily apprehensive over the danger of Congress usurping the powers of the President.

When the history of the last seven years is written, the historian will record the fact that more powers have been vested in the President and more powers unlawfully assumed by him than any other Executive at any time in the history of this Republic. If the powers of the President continue to be enlarged, if the President of the United States continues to usurp the powers that rightfully belong to Congress, the executive branch of the Government with its powerful departments will control the legislative branch of the Government, and the House of Representatives and the Senate will become merely debating societies.

From the beginning of civilization the executive branch of almost every Government has attempted to usurp the powers from the other coordinate branches of the Government, especially the legislative. One of the reasons is the fact that executive powers are exercised by one person while the legislative powers are divided up among many. As the result of the intrenchment of the executive upon the legislative, many legislative branches of Governments have degenerated into mere debating societies. I know of no instance in history of the people losing any of their liberties because the legislative branch usurped any of the powers from the executive branch of the Government.

EXECUTIVE POWER.

President Wilson's attitude toward Congress on the great question of declaring war and making treaties is entirely at variance with all of our earlier statesmen. The President, on his own initiative and without consulting the Congress that was then in session, sent our fleet to Mexico. When our fleet was well under way, so that to have recalled it would have made us the laughingstock of the world, the President asked the approval of Congress. Before the Senate had acted upon it our marines had landed, some of them had been killed, and a number of Mexicans had been killed. A state of war practically existed. No one doubts that the same acts would have been equivalent to war if they had occurred toward any of the larger nations. The power to declare war was expressly and solely given to Congress by the Constitution.

Notwithstanding this express provision of the Constitution, President Wilson treats it as a mere perfunctory power of Congress, the real discretionary power being with the Executive.

So in regard to that other great power, the right of the Senate, one of the treaty-making branches of the Government, to participate in the making of treaties. The President has wholly ignored the Senate in his negotiations in making the most important treaty in the world. He literally carried out the text in his book entitled "Constitutional Government in the United States," published in 1908. I quote from President Wilson as follows:

> One of the greatest of the President's powers I have not yet spoken of at all—his control, which is very absolute, of the foreign relations of the Nation. The initiative in foreign affairs which the President possesses, without any restriction whatever, is virtually the power to control them absolutely. The President can not conclude a treaty with a foreign power without the consent of the Senate, but he may guide every step of diplomacy, and to guide diplomacy is to determine what treaties must be made if the faith and the prestige of the Government are to be maintained. He needs to disclose no step of negotiation until it is complete, and when in any critical matter it is completed the Government is virtually committed. Whatever its disinclination, the Senate may feel itself committed also.

HOW TO COERCE THE SENATE.

In a still earlier work entitled "Congressional Government," published by President Wilson in 1885, he tells how the Executive can coerce the Senate into acquiescence and thus nullify an important part of the Constitution. How nearly President Wilson has carried out the suggestion made by him in his book, I quote his exact language and let the public judge. President Wilson, in his book "Congressional Government," published in 1885, states:

His—

> only power of compelling compliance on the part of the Senate lies in his initiative in negotiations, which affords him a chance to get the country into such scrapes, so pledged in view of the world to certain courses of action that the Senate hesitates to bring about the appearance of dishonor which would follow its refusal to ratify the rash promises or to support the indiscreet threats of the Department of State.

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution provides that the President of the United States shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, providing that two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

Alexander Hamilton, fresh from the Constitutional Convention, pending ratification of the Constitution of the United States, in a speech in New York, speaking of the danger of lodging with one man, the President of the United States, the executive authority to make treaties and control foreign relations, said:

> However proper and safe it may be in governments where the executive magistrate is an hereditary monarch to commit to him the entire power of making treaties, it would be utterly unsafe and improper to intrust that power to an elective magistrate of four years' duration.

Again, he said:

> The history of human conduct does not warrant that exalted opinion of human virtue which would make it wise in a nation to commit interests of so delicate and momentous a kind as those which concern its intercourse with the rest of the world to the sole disposal of a magistrate created and circumstanced as would be a President of the United States.

I have cited the attitude of our present Executive to show the danger of the Executive trenching on the powers of the legislative branch of the Government.

This is not the first time in our history when Congress has attempted to exercise its sovereignty and discharge its duty to the people, that carping critics have questioned its authority in discharging its duty to the people. Prophets were heard in the North, as well as in the South, from 1861 to 1865, contending that the acts of Congress in defending the integrity of the Union were unconstitutional. We all now rejoice that history has proven them to be false prophets, and that we are now a united people, citizens of the best Government that it has pleased the Almighty to foster and perpetuate. The grandsons of the heroes of the North and the South, heroes of the Civil War, have vied with one another in heroic deeds—many, too many, alas, have sacrificed their lives for the honor and glory of our common country on the fair fields of France. Their names will be enshrined in the hearts of all Americans and honored by all lovers of liberty in every land throughout the globe. Pass this resolution and bring home the 19,000 of our boys still in Europe, at an expense of one million two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars a day, and, in the language of one of America's greatest soldiers, Gen. Grant, "Let us have peace." [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER]. [Applause.]

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, a little less than four years ago our Democratic friends exhibited in every city and town throughout the country two celebrated posters, one describing the horrors of war in Europe, the other picturing the peaceful existence of the honest workman in America, together with a large medallion of Woodrow Wilson, advertised to the world that "He kept us out of war."

To-day, I would suggest that our Democratic friends follow the same scheme of advertising now. Picture the George Washington, flying the President's flag and 14 pennants, on each of which be inscribed in large letters one of the 14 points named as "essential in the consideration of peace" by President Wilson in his address to a joint session of Congress on January 8, 1918. The first point named, "Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at," and so forth, should be on the first pennant; the second should have inscribed upon it "Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas," and so forth, for this was the second point; and still another should bear the inscription embodying the principle of "self-determination," and so on, the other picturing the American people bound and shackled, hampered and oppressed, clamoring and pleading as American citizens to be relieved of the burdens imposed by war legislation, and then, the same large medallion as before, but the inscription surmounting same should read, "The price of peace is the surrender of Americanism for internationalism."

As between the two exhibits, the latter, at least, has the merit of picturing the true state of affairs, without any attempt at misrepresentation.

The American people are peace loving, and when President Wilson in 1916 went before them asking for reelection, he knew and his party knew that he could make no more eloquent appeal to secure the votes necessary for his reelection than to say, "He has kept us out of war," although he must have known, as every man in public life knew, that the policy the Administration was pursuing would lead us directly into the war.

Three years ago this week the Congress of the United States, upon the recommendation of the President, declared that a state of war existed between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

Immediately after this declaration the American people, as one man, bent their every energy for the purpose of winning the war. They accomplished what was considered the impossible—we raised an Army of over 4,000,000 men, trained them, and transported 2,000,000 of them to France, and in practically six months' actual fighting we turned defeat into victory and had Germany on her knees begging for peace.

While the war was in progress the President of the United States has enunciated to our allies as well as our enemies the 14 points, to which I have referred, as "essential to the consideration of peace." These points were regarded by the American people as generally satisfactory, and were accepted by our allies, and led to the signing of the armistice on the 11th day of November, 1918, and as a result in the gray dawn of the morning of that day the doughboys, at the very gates of Sedan, received orders that "all firing on all fronts shall cease promptly at 11 o'clock this day."

And on that day, not only throughout the United States but throughout the entire world, there was such rejoicing as had never been known before. Peace was at hand; mothers who had been longing for their sons, wives for their husbands, and sweethearts for their betrothed gave thanks to God for peace and joined in the great rejoicing; and in the hospitals those who had gone to the front—strong men, America's finest and best—and had been returned from the front mutilated and deformed in body gave thanks to God that the war was over and rejoiced in peace; and those other mothers, wives, and sweethearts of the gold star, who knew they would not be reunited with their loved ones until they stand before the Father on the final day of judgment, they, too, gave thanks for peace which had cost them and theirs so dearly.

And when the wild tumult of joy had spent itself America, as America will, turned her thoughts to the actual making of peace and waited with keenest interest word from the President as to who would be delegated as the American representative for this momentous and all-important task, hoping and trusting that, regardless of who the representative was to join our allies, that he would truly represent America and safeguard her interests, with due regard for the 14 principles so publicly announced as the basis on which the treaty of peace would be consummated.

Unfortunately for the American people, however, the President issued this mandate to himself, sincere in his belief, no doubt, that no one but he could accomplish the things he desired to bring about.

Never before in the history of America had a deserved success been so fervently prayed for, never had any emissary of this country carried with him such manifestation of good will as that which accompanied Woodrow Wilson on the day on which he boarded the George Washington.

Previous to the sailing of the George Washington the President dispatched on the Orizaba a picked corps of news correspondents and news photographers, addressed the Congress of the United States, and assured us that not only the Congress but the people should be taken into his confidence; every act of his up to this time, the sending of the correspondents, the assurance to Congress, indicated that he intended to stand firmly by at least the first of the 14 points, which was "open covenants of peace openly arrived at"; but when the President took control of the cables, thus cutting off the members of the press, some doubt was had as to his sincerity.

Americans familiar with European politics well knew the opposition the President would encounter in his attempt to live up to the high ideals enunciated, and with bated breath listened for even the faintest sound of how his battles with the giants fared.

It is impossible to describe the disappointment when we saw he had lost in the first round. He had advocated open covenants of peace to be openly arrived at—affairs between nations were to be discussed in the full light of the sun, and the result of the deliberations to be communicated to every people. To our great disappointment we soon learned that the sessions were held in secret. Only the merest crumbs of the deliberations were given the public. The telegraph and cables were placed under the most rigid censorship, the press was gagged, journalists whom he had sent on the Orizaba, instead of being permitted to see what was going on and to hear what was said, were barred and were obliged to turn into eavesdroppers or to employ backstair methods to give their assumptions and imaginations some warrant of fact.

At length, after five months of secret battle, Woodrow Wilson, the self-styled world's champion of human righteousness, the world's one-time bitterest opponent of militarism, imperialism, nationalism, hatred, and revenge, came forth not only with defeat written all over him but even arrayed on the side of his vanquishers.

The disillusionment of his many friends and admirers was appalling. Probably never before had a man fallen with so sickening a thud as that with which President Wilson fell from the heights to which he had been elevated by public opinion.

All the European people, who a short time before had welcomed him as a deliverer from autocracy, who had hailed him as the spokesman of right and justice, who had worshiped, honored, and respected him, were amazed and sorely disappointed.

It took days and weeks before people could get themselves to believe that what they heard concerning Wilson was true.

As events subsequently proved, as had been feared, President Wilson was no match for the European past masters in the arts and crafts of diplomacy. They soon learned that he was but an amateur in politics, little acquainted with the intricacies and intrigues of European affairs. It no doubt amused these diplomats to see him take himself so seriously, to see him assume the rôle of world arbiter, when they knew that with a little flattery he had become a willing tool in their hands.

Like professionals, they allowed him to have a few bouquets, the plaudits, and acclamation of the people, but when it came to writing the peace treaty and the League of Nations he was not seriously considered, and, according to Secretary Lansing's testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, the 14 points which our President had formulated and to which he had given the widest publicity, and which he had said were "essential in the consideration of peace," were not even discussed at the conference.

He returned to America, bringing with him a treaty of peace and a League of Nations dictated and drafted by the diplomats of Europe, the provisions of which divided the spoils of war and territory according to the desire and previous agreements of the European powers, and, so far as America was concerned, its provisions not only violated the provisions of the Constitution of the United States but our most sacred traditions, policies, and doctrines.

This treaty and League of Nations was presented to the Senate for ratification. There is no question but what the American people want peace. They want no more wars. They want a League of Nations to prevent war, but they also want to preserve the Constitution of the United States; they want to reserve to themselves their sovereignty, their rights, and interests. The Senate, after a wearisome, toilsome, and prolonged discussion and debate, formulated certain reservations, which are as follows:

Resolution of ratification.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers, and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers:

1. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United Sttaes shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provide.

3. No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, part 1, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

6. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles.

7. No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible, as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties.

8. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply to the United States' proportionate share of the expense of the office force and salary of the secretary general.

10. No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress, and the United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than such covenant-breaking State, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

12. Nothing in articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto, or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany, shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

13. The United States withholds its assent to Part XIII (articles 387 to 427, inclusive) unless Congress by act or joint resolution shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said Part XIII, and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.

14. Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, shall be entitled to cast, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate have cast more than 1 vote.

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

15. In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when such government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

There is no question but that the resolution of ratification with these reservations would have passed the Senate by more than a two-thirds vote had the Senators been permitted to vote their convictions. But this privilege was denied them by the President. Thus one "willful man" has defeated the will of the great majority of the 110,000,000 people of the United States.

As a result, it is now evident that we can not have peace by the ratification of the treaty, for the reason that the President insists that the treaty and the League of Nations must be ratified as it was written by the diplomats of Europe, notwithstanding the fact that these same diplomats have signified their willingness to accept the reservations, and, on the other hand, the Senate insists that it can not and will not ratify except with the reservations.

We must therefore choose either to continue a technical state of war indefinitely, with all its burdens, or find some other way to secure peace.

Happily, international law provides three ways of terminating war between belligerents—

First, by a treaty of peace.

Second, by conquest.

Third, by the mere cessation of hostilities, so long continued that it is evident there is no intention of resuming them.

It is this method which has been adopted and on which the resolution now before us is based.

Of course, the followers of the President are opposing this resolution. They tell us we are "playing politics," trying to "gain political advantage," and so forth.

If bringing about peace, which the great majority of the American people demand, is "playing politics" or "gaining political advantage," then we plead guilty.

They accuse us of assailing, condemning, and finding fault with the President.

Yes, we do criticize him, because he has been chosen as the representative of the American people and he fails to represent them, but insists on representing himself and the European nations.

We are told we are embarrassing the President. We deny this, for he has done all the embarrassing, largely because of the untenable position he has taken and his refusal to yield to reason.

Now, let us consider in the light of reason, common sense, the Constitution and international law, this resolution, which provides for the termination of the state of war with Germany, and the objections raised against the adoption of this resolution.

It has been claimed by those opposing the resolution of peace that we have no authority and no power to act in this matter, and that the resolution itself is unconstitutional and if passed is void and of no effect.

The first section of this resolution simply declares—

That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared to be at an end.

This section is predicated absolutely upon official information given to Congress by the President about 17 months ago, when he said: "Thus the war comes to an end, for Germany having accepted these terms of the armistice it will be impossible for the German command to renew it."

When Congress passed the resolution declaring that a state of war existed between the Imperial German Government and the United States it did so upon the advice of the President of the United States and simply declared the fact that a state of war existed, the object of which was to inform officially all neutral nations of the fact so they could govern themselves accordingly, so now, Congress again having been officially informed by the President that "the war is at an end," Congress makes the simple declaration of the fact, for the same purpose, to thus notify the neutral nations of the world.

Furthermore, it is claimed that the Congress has no right to enter into peace negotiations or write a treaty of peace. We thoroughly agree with that view and are not now attempting to write a treaty of peace; we are simply declaring officially what every man, woman, and child in the United States and every other nation on earth knows to be a fact.

Section 2 provides for an official date for the termination of the present state of war for the purpose of terminating various emergency acts of Congress, joint resolutions, proclamations by the President, and so forth, which are absolutely dependent upon the date of the termination of the present emergency.

It is claimed by the gentlemen on the other side, and they have said repeatedly to-day and yesterday, that the war can not end except by the ratification of the treaty of peace, and that Congress has no constitutional authority to recognize any other termination.

Let me point to a provision in the act known as the trading with the enemy act, approved October 6, 1917, as recorded in the Statutes at Large, on page 412, volume 40:

The words "end of the war," as used herein, shall be deemed to mean the date of proclamation of exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace, unless the President shall by proclamation declare a prior date, in which case the date so proclaimed shall be deemed to be the end of the war, within the meaning of this act.

Gentlemen say the war can not end until ratifications are exchanged and proclamation of the fact made by the President, but by this act, passed by the Sixty-fifth Congress, when the Democratic Party was in the majority, these words were enacted into law; you Democrats voted for that act, and I voted for it. The majority of Members on the Republican side, almost all of them, voted for it.

If we had the right then to authorize the President to take certain action, we have the right now. We have the right to repeal that authorization and to fix some other mode of determining the date which shall be the end of the war.

The President's authority to announce a prior date is an authority conferred upon him by act of Congress, and we can repeal that provision and assert the right to name a prior date. We could not have conferred upon him a right that we did not ourselves possess.

We have been told that this resolution is intended to dispose of the pending treaty in the Senate and that support of it is an evidence of partisanship. Quite to the contrary, this resolution is not a treaty of peace and does not in any way conflict, or hamper, or interfere with the writing of a treaty of peace or a league of nations. A treaty of peace should be written and ratified, and nothing contained in this resolution will interfere with so doing. Neither does this resolution dispose of or prevent the United States from joining the League of Nations, when two-thirds of the Senate and the President can agree upon the basis which the United States will join such a league of nations, and there is no question but what the American people desire to join a league of nations, but not at the expense of surrendering our sovereignty at the expense of violating the Constitution of the United States and the surrender of what we deem to be our rights and interests and traditions. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] emphatically denied that the President was responsible for the failure of the Senate to ratify the treaty, but insisted that the Republican Members were responsible. Let us see. The treaty was submitted to the Senate on the 10th day of last September, and after the most exhaustive consideration by that body, on the 19th of November, after contest following contest covering more than a score of test votes, each of which showed that the ratifying body by a decisive majority was ready to ratify the treaty and end the war upon the condition that American sovereignty and independence should not be surrendered, but was prevented from doing so by the Executive influence.

On the 18th of November, the day before the final vote was taken, which was two and one-half months after the treaty was presented to the Senate, came the Executive order, "Defeat it," and it was defeated.

To the appeals from treaty friends, he replied, "I have no concessions in mind."

Three months later a second effort was made, when again all the reservations were adopted by a decisive majority, some of them 2 to 1, and the treaty with the reservations was favored; but the necessary two-thirds failing, again came the short statement "unacceptable," and the treaty has not been ratified, although in every case it was demonstrated that only one willful man stood in the way.

Even now the sentiment in the Senate is in harmony with this thought. Let me direct your attention to the last vote that was taken in the Senate on the question of ratifying the treaty. On that vote there were, including the pairs, by which Members announced their position on the question, 34 Republicans who were in favor of ratification and 23 Democrats; against ratification there were 15 Republicans and 24 Democrats. The majority of the Republicans more than 2 to 1 voted for ratification, with the reservations which had been adopted by the majority of the Senate. It was the vote of 23 Democrats added to the 15 Republicans that prevented ratification, and it is safe to say that had those 23 Democrats voted their convictions or been allowed to do so by the administration the necessary two-thirds vote would have been had in the Senate.

There has not been a moment since the 1st of October when the war could not have been ended technically, as it has been practically, within 24 hours, if the President had been willing.

If my Democratic friends are right, that there is no way to end this war except by the treaty coming from the President and ratified by the Senate, then I want to say to the country that there will be no ending of the war until after the initiation of a treaty shall be placed in some other hands than those of the present President.

At any rate, the passage of this resolution will in no way affect the treaty, and it is not to be supposed that the action of the Senate is necessarily a final disposition of the treaty.

It should also be said and remembered that the great majority of the wars in the past have been ended without a formal treaty of peace. Those that have ended with a treaty of peace have been the exception rather than the rule. I admit it would have been more desirable to have ended this war according to the plain provisions of the Constitution of the United States, but the condition confronting the people is that we find the President and the Senate not in agreement; meanwhile the people of the country are suffering because of war legislation, war burdens, tax burdens, and so forth, which the Congress of the United States can remedy, and the question is, Shall this condition of affairs continue indefinitely, shall the war-time powers conferred upon the President of the United States continue, or shall Congress, acting for and in behalf of the people of the United States, put an end to these conditions?

Gentlemen have said that we should repeal war legislation and thereby put the country on a peace basis. I wonder if the gentlemen have examined this war legislation. It has been ascertained by actual count that there were 61 different acts of emergency legislation passed for the purpose of the war only. Thirty of them are to come to an end upon the proclamation of the treaty of peace, 31 are to come to an end at different periods—3 months, 6 months, 18 months, 3 years, 5 years, and in one case 10 years—after the ratification of peace.

If Congress is to go over these acts one by one and repeal them, or repeal those acts which are not intended to remain in force after the end of the war, it would be more than a full sessions's work for the Congress.

Section 3 deals entirely with foreign trade and commerce and a resumption of trade relations with Germany. This certainly is not unconstitutional, because the Constitution expressly provides that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," and it has always been entirely under the control of Congress and has never before been disputed. It is plain legislation, based upon facts to be ascertained by the President.

Section 4 provides for the enforcement of the act.

Section 5 provides for and protects all the property rights, privileges, and advantages to which the United States has become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed on November 11 or that we are in any way entitled to by reason of our participation in the war. We give nothing, but, to the contrary, maintain our rights in every particular.

Mr. Speaker, this is the most important piece of constructive legislation presented to the House since the beginning of the war. It is a business proposition from start to finish. It is what the people of the country want, and I doubt whether there would be a single vote against this resolution when it comes to final passage if it were not for political reasons, but I assume that when the vote is taken those who in 1916 advertised so extensively "He has kept us out of war" will now vote to keep us out of peace.

It has also been said that by the passage of this resolution we are now deserting our allies, and the things that our Army and Navy fought for will go for naught and that we have made the sacrifices in vain. Quite the contrary is the fact. We have spent over $30,000,000,000; we have plunged the American people into debt; we have allowed 236,000 Americans to become crippled and maimed for life; and we have sacrificed the lives of over 112,000 of the finest and best manhood in the country for the purpose of winning the war, for the purpose of whipping Germany, for the purpose of preserving the civilization of the world, all of which has been accomplished—and shall we not now have peace, the peace which America and her sons have fought, bled, and died for?

The enactment of this legislation into law will bring peace. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I am for this resolution of peace in all the different kinds of language included in the so-called League of Nations. For its passage will at once bring about technical peace and will repeal all the obnoxious war laws now cramping, belittling, and suppressing a peaceful, free, and liberty-loving people.

Congress declared war; it must therefore have a right to end it, and the passage of this resolution through both Houses of Congress will end it, providing our imperial President does not veto it, and if he does the people will have had it pointed out to them who is the real obstructor to our prewar condition of peace and good will toward men. This resolution of peace protects us in all the advantages we would have secured under the treaty and relieves us of all entangling alliances that Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, Roosevelt, Johnson, and all other American patriots have warned us against.

The patriots of the Senate have seen fit to Americanize the treaty, thereby protecting the sovereign power of the people, our traditions, and liberties. But the President insists that it should be passed as prepared without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," which would rob us of the right for which our fathers and the heroes of the late war have fought and bled and died.

Every sane man wants to end wars and is in favor of some sort of arbitration whereby international disputes must be brought for adjudication, but this ill-begotten child called the League of Nations when seen in its nakedness reveals the beginning of a hideous, leering monster of war made of secret treaties, intrigues, and lies, and is the antithesis of all that is holy or ideal.

France is to-day, under the treaty, committing an act of war against Germany. Were we a member of the league to-day we would be involved in a dozen or more European wars. What authority had our President to send our troops to Russia to protect British bonds? Talk about the Constitution! He has not recognized such an instrument during the war, and would have entirely forgotten that it existed had he not wanted to make pretense in the use of it to discharge a faithful servant of his Cabinet and an American patriot who could not sit calmly by and see the traditions and liberties of his country hauled into the mire and make not such bold protests as he could.

It was my vote for the Democratic organization of the House that upheld the hands of our President at the outset of this war. My voice and vote stood constantly behind him in the winning of the war, and I can, I believe, therefore speak the truth without being accused of partisanship. I am an American first, as my record in this House will prove, and I care not to what party any man may have attached himself, when he stands in the way of what I believe to be the rights of my country, I must, in being true to myself, with the light God gives me, strike and call a spade a spade, regardless of what party he belongs to or with what confidence the people have honored him. There is no divine-right-of-kings doctrine in the land of the free and the home of the brave, where every American is a king. [Applause.]

The issue before us to-day is peace versus war, Americanism versus Europeanism, nationalism versus internationalism, democracy versus imperialism, the common man versus the aristocrat, the many versus the privileged few. It is the battle of the weak with the strong; the battle of the humble cobbler, carpenter, mechanic, and laborer in general against the minions of Midas. It is the tiller of the soil against the speculator, gambler, and seeker for riches and glory unearned by the sweat of the brow. It is Morgan & Co. and his international bankers' association against the liberties of mankind.

The so-called League of Nations marks the bloody path back to the jungle of the divine right of kings, from which mankind through the dark centuries has struggled. The proposed league is the most colossal trust of imperialism the world has ever visioned. Through it the sovereign power of the people, who are beginning to comprehend, is to be stealthily transferred beyond their reach. But history is the handwriting of God, and the brave patriots in the Senate have been the instrument with which He has written that our willful President shall not trade our birthright for a mess of pottage. [Applause.] They have fought the greatest moral and intellectual battle of the ages. They have stood against the President and his falsely created public opinion backed by the greatest money organization, with all its various ramifications, that the world has ever known. They have stood majestic, like Horatius at the bridge of Rome, like Leonidas at the pass of Thermopylæ, like Ajax defying the lightning. Their stand will make them famous throughout the world, and a grateful Nation will revere their names as the saviors of their country. [Applause.]

Our President and our former President, Mr. Taft, undoubtedly believed, along with the purpose of the Andrew Carnegie fund, Morgan and his consorts, and their English friends, that the lion and the lamb should lie down together, but our President insists that the lamb should be inside the lion. [Laughter.]

Our President, while in Scotland, made a speech in which he said that he did not think this country was a fit place to die in. He did not say it in exactly those words, but he said he wanted to be buried in Scotland alongside his grandfather. Following in the footsteps of Washington! But his toes are where the heels of Washington used to be. As I look down the trail that he is retreading, I see the throne of King George. Around it in blazing letters I read, "One vote for Canada, one vote for New Zealand, one for Australia, one for Africa, one for India, and one for the United States," just like all the other colonies. [Applause.] We see our imperial President, not like the kings of old, with 100 or even 500 men to run before, but with 23,000, start for Europe to settle the affairs of the world, with his 14 points tucked neatly under his arm. He never brought any of them back. [Laughter.] He sat down at a table and took a hand in the game of distributing the spoils. England got one-third of the face of the world; Italy got her pockets full; France, her lap; and Japan filled her sack. All we got was prohibition. [Laughter.]

After the spoils of war had been distributed so judiciously under their former secret treaties, an intricate plan was adopted which we have come to know as the League of Nations. They were particularly interested in the part of the decree known as article 10, which reads that we should protect their territorial integrity—loot—and which was explained to the President carefully that this was the crux of the whole situation, and he must be sure and put this over, and if he did they would make him president of this supernation. We will just put the word "integrity" instead of "loot," and with the help of our powerful agencies in America it will get by. If it does not, it will break the "heart of the world." A draft of the article having been completed, our President sends a copy it, with a concise declaration, like Cæsar of old. But Cæsar sent his declaration to the Roman Senate. Our Cæsar sent the copy of the league not to the United States Senate, who was equally joined with him in responsibility, but to Morgan & Co., who submitted it to their attorney, Elihu Root, for approval. And, like Cæsar, who said "I came, I saw, I conquered," our President, with that nicety of conception, must have had it, "I came, I saw, and I concurred." [Applause.]

As an American, believing in the traditions and institutions of my country, I oppose the President in the rape of our Constitution and liberty, the trade of our independence for a vassalage, in his so-called League of Nations. And I believe it to be the duty of every red-blooded American, whether Democrat or Republican, to raise his voice in protest, so the people may know that by adopting it they will trade their independence for servitude, liberty for slavery, democracy for imperialism.

If the people understood this hideous monster of foreign rule he is attempting to fasten upon us 75 per cent of them would not be for this League of Nations. Public men should fearlessly tear away this rosy veil of peace that has been draped around this germinator of strife, of dissension, of enmity, and of war while the mouths of the people have been muzzled by imperial order, and who still, through his Attorney General, insists upon a permanent sedition law, which has already passed the Senate, to continue to close the mouths of the people and their public servants who might continue to inform them, while he crowds over this nefarious thing which is to be used to reelect him and thereby satisfy his insatiable ambition to become the president of this supernation.

Every mother's son and daughter of the United States should understand what this league means and set themselves to encourage and support the noble patriots in the Senate, who are standing, and pray God they may continue to stand, for the rights, liberties, independence, and faith of our fathers.

The man twice honored by the confidence of the great people of this country, having drunk deep of imperialistic power during the war, is loath to put aside that beverage. In his begrogged condition he dreams of being president of a supernation. The average American chafes under deliberation. He will not read the 263 pages of the peace treaty; nor will he pay attention to or ponder its meaning. He will hardly endure to follow an explanation and analysis of it. He has been told that the League of Nations will bring about closer cooperation between nations and avoid war; that it represents the triumph of right. He has been led to expect that in it the United States plays a glorious and unselfish rôle; that the eyes of the world are upon us; that in some mysterious way we have been obligated to enter it. He, moreover, is impatient that the war shall cease, and he will not tolerate long discussion or analysis, nor any argument or separation of the treaty or the league if such separation or argument shall prolong the state of war.

The American spirit is too often apt to act first and be sorry after, or perhaps to forget if the being sorry involves too much discomfort. The obligation is upon everyone to think hard and clearly what this treaty involves.

In an effort to coerce the Senate into a speedy acceptance, without due consideration of the treaty and its rider, the League of Nations, an arrangement was made that our merchants could not resume trade relations with Germany till after the treaty of peace was signed. Whether this was kept by other countries or not, our merchants best know. It is to be hoped they will recognize who is the true enemy of American business and the cause of our not having technical peace in this cunningly planned delay. Not the Senate, who must in duty take time to weigh and consider this most momentous document in all our country's history.

That another swarm of bees should be loosed about the Senate's ears, the President told the wet leaders that as soon as the treaty was signed he would consider removing war-time prohibition. It was up to the President to remove this ban, but he craftily used the delay to align the liquor interests along with the ministers and the business interests to stampede the Senate into rapid and ill-considered action.

The ministers of the gospel who are so strong for peace should read the treaty. Some churchmen, lured by the bait of avoiding all war, valiantly urge the support of the League of Nations in the name of religion. They overlook the sacrifice involved, declare with fervent zeal that it is wrong, selfish, and narrow to think of ourselves, and wrong to refuse to make sacrifices when, by such a little thing as the loss of the liberty and independence and security of the United States, we can be free at once and forever of all wars. How much better to maintain this Christian land as the home of liberty and democracy. It is hard to think that sensible people can so delude and hypnotize themselves.

They use the very arguments suggested by England for the thing England desires. Lord Robert Cecil said:

> I see it suggested in some places that the United States should not accept membership in the League of Nations because it might involve some sacrifice of national sovereignty. It would be foolish to deny that if nations are to make any organization for peace each of them must be content to modify to some degree, however slight, its liberty of action. That is the inevitable result of cooperation, and I do not wish to underrate the sacrifice involved.

What would Lord Robert Cecil say if the proposition were reversed and it was England who stood to lose her power and place, and who was to be humiliated to a place among the dependent representatives of the United States.

What is article 10? In article 10 the United States, along with other members of the league, agrees to respect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. We, by agreeing to this, bind ourselves to maintain in perpetuity the agreements concluded in the present peace treaty, just or unjust. And as to external aggression, that internal aggression which may be held to threaten or involve external aggression, may be interpreted by the league to constitute cause for our conscripting our youth and sending them into any far-away land the representatives of the league may see fit, a league where we have one vote, and Liberia has a vote, and the British Empire has six votes.

The plan is to make the League of Nations do, justly or unjustly, what it might take a war to do. Matters not whether the aggressor be Ireland or Korea or China, struggling to regain or obtain just rights. Our boys will be called upon to leap to the defense of this present agreement. Is that why they went across the sea to make the world safe for democracy? This is not democracy, but a rarely planned imperialism. "Prevent war?" Restitution to the wronged, recognition of weak new nations, and justice instead of kowtowing to the powerful might have done so. "Prevent war?" There is in this section a threat of war in every ripple of unrest from anarchistic Italy, disturbed Ireland, ravished China, and downtrodden Korea. And shall the United States leave her position, upheld till now, as the champion of the oppressed and take her place by the side of the autocrat and tyrant, to maintain existing political independence and territorial integrity?

The league will not prevent war, but it will prevent speedy and adequate defense. What do the big four care about peace, except as it means that their vast acquisitions are preserved to them intact? And they are careful to arrange to tie us up to maintain this peace. The immolation of our boys in Russia is a foretaste of the imperial attitude, without constituted authority which the League of Nations will bring forth. How will the cheated fathers and mothers respond when, after enthusiastically embracing this thing which was to end all war, they are called upon to see their sons set forth indefinitely for the ends of the earth, to maintain and preserve for the Hedjaz of Arabia or the Sultan of Zulu his tottering territorial integrity? To rob a nation of its sovereignty and then expect it to exercise that sovereignty is an anomaly. To preserve its sovereignty, a nation must keep for its own decision all questions of immigration, of peace and war, of commerce, of the size of its army and navy. To pledge that our Nation shall, at some time in the future, go to war on some unknown cause is folly. Who can foresee what disastrous policy that would commit us to? All wisdom will not die with us. The future citizens of America can be reasonably relied on to act with equity.

Article 21 purports to keep for us our Monroe doctrine. But it does nothing of the kind. After the assertion by the President on his first return that the wording of the treaty should not be changed, and that the Monroe doctrine had been translated in the league to a new idea, extending it to the world, it is nothing strange that it should not be preserved. The dishonesty of pretending to do one thing when it does another makes those who care for America and her interests distrust the whole plan. No one favoring the spirit of the Monroe doctrine would call it a treaty of arbitration or a regional understanding to preserve peace. The Monroe doctrine is bound and delivered over to the administration of the League of Nations, to the very ones who all these years it has been protecting us against, to the tender mercies of its enemies. A Monroe doctrine extended to the world is a Monroe doctrine destroyed, wiped off the face of the earth. Our one great bulwark of defense needlessly sacrificed, thrown away, by one too indifferent or too blinded by self-interest to value it or safeguard it. The British were open in their interpretation of this amendment. They say in their press, "Should any dispute arise concerning it, the league is there to settle it." Do you want that, you Americans?

Do you want the Monroe doctrine wiped out and the league substituted to settle, say, a controversy with Japan? Britain, Japan's ally, bound in secret treaty to go to war with them, or vice versa, has six votes to our one. Suppose it was a question we wanted settled affirmatively, the vote of one member could block it, and in the assembly, therefore, the vote of Hejaz would be just as strong as the vote of the United States.

This is not a league of all nations but a league of a few nations. Not a democracy, but a trust. Membership of new nations must receive a vote of two-thirds. There is no provision as to how the members are to be elected or how long they shall serve. They will be in no true sense representatives of the people. Nor will it be a democracy, for here the power trickles down from above—a council of nine members. The big five will control that. The assembly will have 31 members, and 13 others have been invited to join. These 13 do not include Germany, Austria, Turkey, Bulgaria, Ukraine, Jugo-Slavia, Finland, Russia, Luxemburg—two-thirds of Europe—Mexico, Bolivia, Arabia, Palestine, or Egypt.

Yet hear what the President himself had to say concerning foreign entanglements, concentration of power, and secret treaties:

> There are actually men in America who are preaching war, who are preaching the duty of the United States to do what it never would before—seek entanglements in the controversies which have arisen on the other side of the water—abandon its habitual and traditional policy, and deliberately engage in the conflict which is now engulfing the rest of the world. I do not know what the standard of citizenship of these gentlemen may be. I only know that I for one can not subscribe to those standards. (From a speech by President Wilson at Des Moines, Iowa, 1914, 9 months after the sinking of the Lusitania and 18 months after the invasion of Belgium.)
> When we resist, therefore—when I, as a Democrat, resist—the concentration of power, I am resisting the process of death, because concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human initiative and therefore of human energy. (From a speech of Woodrow Wilson in 1912.)
> The theory of government which I decline to subscribe to is that the vitality of the nation comes out of the closeted councils where a few men determine the policy of the country. (President Wilson at Philadelphia, 1918.)

The President resists any suggestion of a change in his covenant. He admits that the league will mean the sacrifice of United States sovereignty, but declares "at whatever cost of independent action, every government should lend itself to the new purpose." He also demolishes the position taken at first by his would-be backers, that the league will be merely advisory. It is a hard and fast agreement, no scrap of paper, and Uncle Sam will be thoroughly bound by it once he sets his mighty fist thereto.

The American people for several years have lock stepped along to a remarkable series of slogans; specious parrot cries, mouth-filling, that take the place of argument, each the accompaniment to some national humiliation. First, "Watchful waiting." Next, "Too proud to fight." "He kept us out of war." "Safe for democracy." "Pitiless publicity." Then, as a most tremendous climax to this series of cast skins, preparing the way for the triumphant march to victory of the League of Nations, "Promote peace and prevent war." A phrase acceptable to every class in the United States. What sane man wants war? But what prudent sick man is going to swallow every quack nostrum that is offered because of its bright, alluring promise of cure?

It was not the act of a friend of peace to represent at the peace conference that the United States was heart and soul for a League of Nations as a means to prevent future wars, and to use the necessity of Europe and our resources as a lever to force the nations of Europe to interweave the peace treaty with the League of Nations. The war-weary world, dying for peace, had to wait six months that this sleight of hand might be thoroughly done. And then, when they have accepted it, thinking that if the great United States was for it it must be good, it was not the act of a friend of peace to come back and say it would break the heart of Europe if we did not conform to his covenant. That is what Abraham Lincoln called lifting yourself by your own boot straps. It was not the act of a friend of peace to keep the people absolutely in the dark as to developments except such strained and purposely colored bits as were allowed to creep out from the council. One interested in America first would have kept them informed of all the interweaving facts, kept the Senate abreast, so that when it came time to act they would be prepared, not left to flounder in a mass of new, unexplained facts, with no sidelights on the motives and interests back of the various clauses.

The President said, "There is no need that I should report to you what was done at Paris. You have been daily cognizant of what was going on there. The cross currents must have been evident to you." It reminds us of his imploring the Senate not to discuss the peace treaty and the League of Nations till his return, when the first thing he announced was the time for discussion was past. And yet, without time for discussion, never furnished with complete files, in the dark as to secret agreements, with several conflicting explanations and hasty denials on vital points, the Senate was expected to swallow, without reservation or amendment, the whole ill-constructed mess.

No considerations of a future war should have been allowed to hold up the peace in the present war. The treaty should have been ratified at once, and separately. Then the League of Nations could have been considered at leisure. There is no provision in the Constitution of the United States for either the President or the Senate to subject the people to such domination as that of the League of Nations. Let the light in on it. Let the people know, and let the people then decide. I don't believe the Senate and the President should bind on our backs this infamous proposition without hearing from the people. If, like Esau, they are so hungry, so craven, have such appetite for bodily comfort and soft-handed personal ease as to trade their birthright for a mess of pottage, that they must have a meal now, all right. The voice of the people is the voice of God, and it must be His will that we shall be so commingled that the seeds of dissension sown will bring about the battle of all nations, the Armageddon, that shall sweep away all dross and bring the thousand years of peace.

The advocates of the new idea have managed to create a propaganda that patriotism is no longer the fashion, something to be ashamed of, an old-fashioned sentiment. It puts me in mind of something I read just before the war broke out that crashed like an unholy thing upon my consciousness, a ripple of thought brought about by foreign propaganda, that subsidized our free speech, our lecture platforms, our pulpits, and chairs in colleges and universities, so that a university professor was emboldened to say, "The flag and patriotism are an illusion." It was this tendency that caused Theodore Roosevelt to charge that the moral fiber of Americans was relaxing. The flabby arguments of the pacifists, appealing to the gross and selfish, the cowardly and self-seeking, was making fat oxen of our citizens. The conscientious objectors, the I. W. W.'s, pacifists, and pro-Germans hid their heads under the drastic laws of war time, but now they are noisily at it again. Are people so blinded by a promise that a set of agreements will avoid all war that they are content to put their heads in the sand and refuse to consider a document that blasts the foundation stones of our Nation, so well laid by our wise and clear-visioned forefathers; indifferent to the sacrifice of principles that our fathers were not too proud to fight and die for, flinging away with profligate unthinking our inheritance?

This is no new hope—this plan of alliance of nations, unselfish in aim, to protect the weak from aggressions of the strong. Such a league has been dreamed of and previsioned ever since a thousand years ago. The hope of the brotherhood of man is an ideal that can be relied on to kindle dreams and expand the hearts of everyone. But it is an unpatriotic act to trade upon such a hope with false promises, to juggle with words that conceal instead of reveal purposes, to promise without fulfillment.

We are bidden to forego national pride, consideration for our country, our ideals as a Nation, the fulfillment of our glorious destiny, or we are, forsooth, selfish and narrow of vision. Can this be the end of our mission? Are we to tread the path of nonresistance to oblivion, this great and glorious country, the hope of the world, the vision of the oppressed people of all lands, the promised land, set apart, purified, made a haven by special preparation, its people free and untrammeled, kings every one, who never have bowed the knee or bent the neck to any conqueror? Are we to go under the yoke? We were not defeated. For what, then? For coming to the aid of warring nations when they were licked, when they had their backs to the wall, and surrender was a question of weeks? They could not win; they called valiantly for help. We went and won in six months with a cost of 150,000 killed and $57,000,000,000—they had been fighting for three years and a half. And for that we shall be penalized.

If America is bound to mix in European affairs, Europe is bound to return the compliment; but why does our lending aid in this war tie us up to the troubles of Europe ad infinitum? How are we tied to the quarrels of the future in which we have no interest? If the League of Nations becomes a power the United States will give over its command to a council of men outside the country and receive orders from them. This is a condition of the league not possible to falsify or blink or evade.

The United States is, far deeper than President Wilson means, the hope of the world. The bank of the world. The meat and drink of the world. But all the work that is set for the United States to accomplish can be done more efficiently, in a more businesslike way, more equitably, if we retain our independence and do not put our heads in a noose.

Democracy is threatened. The constitutional form of government is in danger. The process of reducing Congress to a rubber stamp was successfully carried out during the war, when the President was given powers as absolute as a czar, and patriotism held criticism dumb. Internationalism, which is being offered us as a substitute for Americanism and patriotism, is death to American liberty and independence. It is the same thing that the I. W. W.'s believe in; the same doctrine as that of the Bolshevists, only it is reversed to fit the autocrat. To link our fate so closely to the fate of nations everywhere will destroy us as a free people. It is not jingoism to assert that we are different from the nations and peoples of all the rest of the world. We have been accustomed so long to bear the supercilious condescension and assumption of superiority of the rest of the world that it comes as a shock almost to find that we are broader minded, more honest, more sincere, and our ideals are genuine and lofty. We can not mix milk and mud and have anything but mud. Europe is a hundred years behind America. It does not know what liberty is. There is no such thing as disinterest or unselfishness in their claims or dealings with other nations.

Human nature has not changed much in the war. Except for the boy who has been through the Golgotha of the trenches, there has not been that general spiritual ennobling that some were looking for. There is not any royal or vicarious road to the millennium when you have to build on the same old crotchets and the same, or vaster, selfishness. Ask the returned soldier whether he found any brotherly love in England or France, or anywhere else. The peoples of Europe have been so scarred by war that they are fearful, suspicious, vengeful, full of hate. They have lost the warmth of feeling, the impulse toward sympathy they had even at the time of the armistice. They are incapable of thinking honestly or fairly. They should not be allowed to tie our hands and clip our wings.

We must follow our own judgment, act according to our ideals, or the world will sink back into the old war-breeding welter of grasping selfishness. One fact America must admit, that there has been a good deal of halo draped around our noble allies. Anyone who visits Europe is struck by the sordid selfishness, the small-minded intrigue, the devious deceit, the self-seeking, the greed for America's money, not even veiled, touched even with a peremptoriness and impatience of our slowness. They look upon us, the only solvent, going Nation in the world, as in duty bound to assume their burdens and lift them along.

It would come with a little better flavor if we could have the privilege of giving our aid, instead of having it forced from us at the point of a pistol. America can work best for humanity as a free agent. She has never proved niggardly of her sons or of her treasure. At least, she should have the privilege of dispensing her aid in accordance with her own judgment.

Not one act of generous impulse or unselfish idealism was performed by a single one of the European nations at the peace table. They were only concerned with getting all they could, with yielding as little as they could. The fact that the United States did not join in the mad scramble was a matter for contempt not of admiration, only confirming them in the idea that we were a nation of easy marks. The United States is the only one who makes sacrifices and gets nothing. Europe makes no sacrifice under the league and gets everything. We have not a friend in all Europe. Six months of clawing, irritating meddling have served to turn from us every nation in the world. The British are bitter because we undertook to keep the interned ships which sought our ports. They said it was only because of the English Navy that they were forced to seek our shores, and we were, hence, not entitled to them.

The House of Commons broke into a roar of Homeric laughter at the mention of the proposed League of Nations. They betrayed then what they have so long concealed, that our President was duped by their seeming agreement to his hobby into granting them the basis which will make of them the mightiest nation in the world. What need they care, when they were assured of their command of the seas, their losses fully underwritten, their control of the future league made certain by six votes to our one, vast increases to territory, a wonderful succession of diplomatic victories, and in return only a promise to sign the League of Nations agreement.

Bewildered by his view from the high mountain, the President has let himself become the cat's-paw for England and for Japan. He has allowed himself to enter upon the very thing he assured us the League of Nations made unnecessary—an alliance of nations for war. The great powers of Europe refuse to trust their own safety to the league. England does not rely on it, but retains her control of the seas. Italy does not rely upon the league, but insists upon the rectification and strong fortification of her frontier. France has her league against war within the league. These stand to the respective nations for their Monroe doctrine. Why are they not as well protected by the league as we are given to believe the United States is? Why confess at the outset that the League of Nations is an unsuccessful theory if it will not hold, even before attack, without internal bracing?

The President said, "There can be no alliances or special understandings within the general or common family of the league." And yet the whole fabric of these secret understandings have been worked out in the peace treaty, and so interwoven with the League of Nations that the President says they can not be separated.

Last April it was flatly denied from the White House, by the President's secretary, that the President had made any such alliance as the agreement with France. But when the treaty comes out there it is, the fact of such a promise having been given; another trade to get a vote for his hobby. But it did not make the French our friends. Our soldiers noticed a change creep over the spirit of their dreams before they left France. Recently one of their statesmen blamed the United States for the cloud between France and Italy. It was not through any lack of demand of France that we were not burdened with the great European war debt, for the French proposed that the belligerents pay according to population; next as to wealth. So they would get us either way.

When I was in Paris, time after time Frenchmen broached the suggestion to me that I personally ask our President on my return to make a public statement that after the war half of our merchant marine, then built or to be built, would be turned over to France. It would make for better feeling, they said. And with what distress and alarm they viewed our work on their inadequate and old-time harbors, made necessary by their incapability of handling our troops going to their relief. They feared we had an interested eye, looking to the future of our commerce.

Japan clearly shows her intention to anyone who is not asleep of trying to deceive the rest of us. Any change in her Shantung steal and she would not sign, and shook aloft her still unsettled racial-equality clause, the clause that was defeated, not by the vote of our President, as you would suppose, but by the vote of the Australian premier, who was desirous of keeping Australia still a white man's country. And then can anyone in honesty declare that Japan has any intention of releasing Shantung, now or ever?

The apologists for this monstrous deed say that Japan will right the wrong. They leave it to the cat who ate the canary to make it right with the canary.

All decisions must be unanimous, so what chance will any oppressed nation in the future have as against its oppressors? What chance will we have on our race-equality difference with Japan? Her contrary vote will balance ours. What chance will China have when always Japan's negation stands between her and her rights? Mr. Taft asks why we did not object to Germany's act when it was committed. We were not in the business of world meddling then, whatever might have been our opinion. But now he asks us to condone—to be a party to—this act. It was wrong then; it is wrong now.

Japan is a skillful, watchful waiter. In due time, when the League of Nations shall be a going concern, she will call up the matter of our immigration laws. Her vanity, smoldering so long under what she fancies is humiliation, will feed fat the ancient grudge she bears us. We will hasten to give our noble ally everything she asks just to keep out of trouble, as has been our policy all along through the Taft and Wilson administrations. Nothing is really worth fighting for if it is American seems to be their motive, as illustrated by the surrender of free tolls to our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal.

We went to war avowedly to destroy militarism. We fought not for territory nor for reprisals. We did not gain anything by entering the conflict. All well and good; but instead of standing fast for the principles he himself had enunciated, our President admits that he was responsible for yielding up Shantung to Japan; for the stripping from China of vast territory and millions of subjects, in flat opposition to his high-sounding doctrine of self-determination. Two hundred thousand Chinese laid down their lives during the war, from this very district of Shantung, and now their reward is that by an ally, a friend from time immemorial, the yoke they were fighting to remove is bolted the harder on the necks of their fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters.

Here is the basis of a militaristic and imperialistic menace that we shall have to thank our own President for, an American, supposedly representing America and safeguarding her rights.

It is a victory for Japanese diplomatic strategy. It confirms their rapacious predatory attitude toward both China and Russia. It will turn the Chinese, who have looked on us as friends, into enemies. China's fate in the matter of Shantung was decided by the big five, of whom four, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, had secret agreements. The only chance was for President Wilson to hold out. His contrary vote would have disposed of the matter. But he did not do it.

He gave away one ideal after another, one right after another, in his futile chase after a will-o'-the-wisp.

Trading, compromising. Fine phrases, with no intellectual honesty back of them. Oh, for a good stiff-spined American patriot; oh, for a Roosevelt or a Johnson at the peace table. We had every advantage. We needed not to creep and crawl in order to have our ideals made into perpetual world law. We had what Europe had to have. They had nothing we needed. We won their war. But in a short while, the astute, Machiavelian old world had won the mastery. It was a humiliation. All the world laughs at the matching of minds of the dreamer, while it sneers at an easy victory.

Where is the freedom of the seas we heard so much about? Self-determination? The rights of small peoples? Where any shadow or substance of the peace for all the world in this great combination of the mighty to "respect and maintain existing territorial integrity"? To continue into perpetuity wicked and unjust aggression and conquest. It is the most imperialistic plan ever conceived. A world empire.

We are expected to safeguard the same old wrongs, the same old injustices, the same old plunderings and greed and selfishness that have made all the causes for war in the past. Why will the League of Nations preserve peace and prevent war? Because the United States will preserve France and England and Japan and Italy in their aggressions.

Should the United States be complaisant toward this hideous thing, which England views with amusement, France with impatience, Japan with an inscrutable reserve, China with despair, Italy with hatred, while the "small nations," made mock of, and treated, as ever, like pawns, stand utterly bewildered at illusions lost and hopes flouted?

We have been duped into underwriting a peace so unjust and vicious that without our aid it could not persist, but would soon break up in war. We have entangled ourselves in prospect in every little European squabble, regardless of its merits or interests.

Whatever troubles arise over there, we have the burden of maintaining the balance of power. If the rights of China and Korea are done to death, in secret, even before the League of Nations, meets, when the diplomats of the craft are on their good behavior, what will happen when a few men meet in secret to parcel out the world? What has there been in the past 17 months to comfort the hope of the small nations? Strong nations have been made stronger. Grabbing right and left has been the order of the day. Even a great and generous ally has been bound and gagged, lest peradventure she prove dangerous in the future.

We have no place among such expert diplomats. We have not been trained in "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain." Our place should be this side the water, minding our own business.

We have become a world power. Circumstances have made us so. But our position is not one of dependence on that account. We are powerful, independent, as we are; able to do for needy peoples better and more successfully just in proportion to that power and independence. Why must we descend to the level of the bankrupt and crafty, the caste-ridden countries of Europe? The intrigue, the deceit, the secret agreements, that have entangled us in their meshes already, before the League of Nations is even well under way, show what is before us.

We can not marry Europe, Asia, and the Hejaz of Armenia to reform them. It would the rather be a union "with a clown, the grossness of whose spirit would have weight to drag us down." Because the submarine has undermined the safety of right little, tight little island empires, because modern warfare leaps, Remus-like, over all fortifications, is no argument that we should abandon our commanding position in order to be of service. We are strong, with the strength of a clear-thinking, high-purposed race. We can never sit around the gambling table with the hairsplitting, jealous diplomats of the old school. Brotherhood of man! What does it mean, and what voice has it had in the present negotiations for peace?

If a national spirit breeds wars, as advocates of the league claim, there is plenty of evidence that such spirit remains in the other countries, and it will be time enough for us to begin the brotherhood of man when there is some sign of its being practiced instead of so generally preached.

Somebody has nationalism mixed up with Kaiserism. But nationalism in America means America first, just as, reduced to its lowest terms, it means family first. Theodore Roosevelt said, "The best man in the community is the man who thinks of his family first." Rip Van Winkle was one of your good fellows, glad to muddle in everyone's quarrels, but not a high type of citizen at that. There are men a plenty to whom other men's wives look just as good as their own. They are not so narrow and selfish and pygmy-minded and old-fashioned as to love their own wives best. Internationalism savors of free love. It lacks the stern morality dear to the hearts of patriots who fashion their hopes and beliefs after the men of our country's elder days.

Do we want our morals to be controlled by Japan, with her geishas and her picture brides and her open and wanton and unabashed laxness of living? When we consider that our lives are to be regulated by a majority of nations whose populations are scarce civilized and illiterate to the last degree, we can not hope that our ideals will be the ones to survive in all their purity.

> For East is East, and West is West,
> And never the twain shall meet.

Frenchmen will be Frenchmen, Britons British, and Yankees Yanks in spite of all efforts to internationalize them. You can not have a supernation till you destroy the differences that have cleft the nations asunder since the Tower of Babel. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, we have had a good many kinds of protests against this resolution, and have even had one from the maternity ward, presented by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN]; but the protests all seem to be based on the theory that we are attempting to embarrass the administration and the President. People do not generally protest against attempts unless they are likely to be successful. The things that people protest against are conditions existing, or imminent facts which they want to change.

Now, our Democratic friends assure us that this resolution will never become law because the President will veto it. Undoubtedly he will do so. Nevertheless, the protest of the minority increases hourly. They complain against this as an attempt to embarrass the administration. The whole course of this debate shows that the real ground of their complaint is not the attempt to embarrass. It is the existing fact of the embarrassment. The facts are now embarrassing to the President and to the minority, and they are daily becoming more so with the approach of the election. These embarrassing facts are that the American people want a definite, official, technical termination of the war; that the President has had the daily opportunity since last October to effect such a termination with the consent of two-thirds of the Senate; that he has declined to comply with the wishes of the American people because he could not do so and still carry out his own theory of internationalism; and that when this resolution is presented to him he will be obliged once again to meet the alternative of complying with the wishes of the American people or of insisting upon his own, and that he will do the latter.

Yesterday the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL], standing on the floor of the House, made a tearful speech to his district in which he denounced the Republican side of the House for its alleged cruelty and callousness in applauding the remarks of a Republican Representative who referred to the President's sickness. This was quite different, he said, from the exceptionally generous and chivalrous conduct of the Kentucky General Assembly in regretting the assassination of President McKinley.

There is a kind of political pathology involved in such an argument. I can assure my friend that we all want the President to get well. We sincerely hope that his recovery may be complete. We hope it will be an actual recovery, sufficient to enable him to be the candidate of his party for reelection. We would much rather have him the Democratic candidate than, for example, our present colleague, that seasoned statesman, the gentleman from Missouri, whom we know to be not only wise but sensible, even if he is not always right—even if he is now mistaken as to the side George Washington would take.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], in the speech which my friend from Kentucky so severely criticized, was speaking of a man who was not by any means lying upon his death bed, but who was at least well enough to summarily dismiss a member of his Cabinet who had attempted to carry on a part of the country's necessary business during his illness; well enough to hold most of his party in the Senate in line against the wishes of the people of the United States; well enough at this moment to whip the minority of this House to vote against peace and against their own convictions.

The gentleman from Illinois, as we all know, is one of the kindliest and gentlest characters in the House. He could not possibly derive pleasure from the suffering of any other man. Surely it was not a breach of propriety for him to say of a man who is now probably almost well that he got sick when his arguments were shown to be fallacious by the facts of current history.

Gentlemen of the minority, it is facts which are your embarrassment to-day.

The real fact is that the gentleman from Illinois offended not by saying that the President had been sick, but by pointing out that the Democratic Party is now sick. My friends, there is one way for your party to get well, and that is to get back in harmony with the American people. The American people are tired of this deadlock on a declaration of peace. They know that the fault is yours. We are now giving you Democrats an opportunity to get back your party health by disowning the fault and voting for this resolution. If you do not do so your recovery at all is extremely doubtful. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, in opposition to this resolution it is contended that Congress has no power to declare peace and that section 1 of the resolution is therefore void on its face. It is pointed out that this is a Government of separate powers, and that the treaty-making power being vested in the President and the Senate, they possess exclusive power to end war. I submit that this argument is based upon an erroneous assumption of what the separation of powers in the Constitution means. It does not mean that the President and Congress together can not accomplish what the President and the Senate alone can do. The fallacy of the argument is based upon the error that one part of the Government is greater than the whole. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to declare war, yet the practice has been in every instance that declarations of war have been in the form of acts of Congress signed by the President. No one has suggested that the declarations of war were unconstitutional because in the form of an act of Congress signed by the President. On its face this resolution does not contemplate that Congress act alone. The presumption is that this, like every other joint resolution, will pass both Houses and will be submitted to the President. We have no right to assume that the President will veto it. Has anyone got the hardihood to say that if this resolution passes both Houses and is signed by the President that it will be unconstitutional, forsooth, because the President alone, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, by treaty could determine the state of war? The opposition, therefore, must be based upon the theory that the President will veto this resolution and that if it is passed over the veto then it will be unconstitutional. That would be an argument against passing the resolution over the veto of the President, but it is not an argument now, for we have the right to assume that the President will sign it. For certainly what the President can do alone, Congress and the President can do jointly.

The first section of this resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

Section 2 provides that this declaration shall terminate all resolutions, and so forth, and all war powers of the different statutes enacted during the war.

Section 3 provides that Germany shall have 45 days after the passage of the resolution in which to notify the President that it accepts its terms and waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals all claims or demands against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles. In case of such notice commercial relations are to be resumed.

Section 4 provides penalties for violations of the terms of the resolution as to trading with the enemy.

Section 5 provides that the passage of the resolution shall not be construed as a waiver of any rights under the armistice signed November 11, 1918.

The writers on international law are agreed that there are three ways of terminating war between belligerents, as follows:

First, by a treaty of peace; second, by the conquest and subjugation of one of the belligerents by the other; third, by the mere cessation of hostilities so long continued that it is evident that there is no intention of resuming them.

"War may be terminated in three different ways: Belligerents may (1) abstain from further acts of war and glide into peaceful relations without expressly making peace through a special treaty, or (2) belligerents may formally establish the condition of peace through a special treaty of peace, or (3) a belligerent may end the war through subjugation of his adversary." (Oppenheim, International Law, vol. 2, p. 322.)

"There are three ways of terminating hostilities between States, namely, (1) by a mere cessation of hostilities of both sides, without any definite understanding supervening; (2) by the conquest and subjugation of one of the contending parties by the other so that the former is reduced to impotence and submission; (3) by a mutual arrangement embodied in a treaty of peace whether the honors of war be equal or unequal.

"Under the first mode the relationships between the parties remain in a condition of uncertainty, and, owing to the numerous difficulties involved, combatant States have very seldom resorted to this method of withdrawing from the war without arriving at some definite and intelligible decision." (Phillipson, Termination of War and Treaties of Peace, p. 3.)

"It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances." (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, July 22, 1868, Dip. Cor., 1868, vol. 2, pp. 32 to 34, cited Moore's International Law, vol. 7, p. 336.)

It is undisputed that war can begin without a declaration of war. A declaration of war may precede or follow actual hostilities. Where it follows, it simply declares that a state of war exists. This was the form adopted in the present case as well as in the Spanish War. In that case the declaration was passed April 25 and war was declared to exist then, and to have existed from April 21. The convention adopted at The Hague conference in 1907 provides that hostilities "must not commence without a previous and explicit warning in the form of a declaration of war."

I said that the argument that this was an infringement of the treaty-making powers would be good, if true, on the question of passing the resolution over the veto. But we contend that this resolution is not in fact a treaty, and that therefore it does not violate the prerogative of the President and Senate. The treaty of Versailles is not dead. It can be sent back at any time and be ratified. This resolution does not prevent that. The only thing that stands in the way of ratification is the deadlock between the President and the Senate on the covenant of the League of Nations. If the President would agree to the Senate reservation on article 10 ratification would instantly follow and peace by treaty be an accomplished fact. What is that reservation? Here it is:

"Reservation No. 2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which under the Constitution has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide."

It will be observed that the only thing this does is to preserve the power of Congress to declare war. Should we surrender that power so that our boys could be sent to fight in foreign lands without our consent? Is it asking too much that before this is done the elected Representatives of the people in Congress assembled shall consent? To do otherwise would be a contradiction of the very idea of a government of, by, and for the people, a clear violation of our fundamental law and a craven surrender of our independence to foreigners. When the peace of the world was ruthlessly broken and the very existence of free popular government was threatened, America without treaty obligations, but because of a high sense of duty to civilization and the world, entered the war as the champion of liberty and right, and by reason of her power and the bravery and gallantry of her sons, many of whom are buried on the fields of France, brought it to a successful conclusion.

Should a similar occasion arise, America will not be found wanting.

I have long advocated international arbitration as a substitute for war. I joined the American group for international arbitration when I first came to Congress 17 years ago. I have sought to further the cause for which it stands. I believe that the League of Nations can be so perfected as to be an aid to peace in the future, but I do not believe it is necessary to surrender our independence or our birthright to get such an organization established.

I believe the Lodge reservations sufficiently Americanize the covenant and protect our fundamental rights as a free people, and that with these reservations the peace treaty should be ratified. I believe it eventually will be so ratified, either in this or a subsequent administration. Pending such a result we should pass this resolution. The people demand it and are entitled to it. In the language of Gen. Grant, "Let us have peace." [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS].

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, if I thought that the passage of this resolution would prevent or hinder the resubmission and ratification of the peace treaty, I would vote against it. I have favored and still favor the peace treaty containing the League of Nations covenant and wish to see it ratified—of course, with suitable reservations that shall fully and effectively protect all American rights and interests. Such protection, in my judgment, is afforded by the so-called Lodge reservations. With those reservations, my understanding is that the treaty might be ratified to-morrow; without them, it has long been apparent that it can not be ratified at all.

The passage of this resolution by Congress will not prevent the resubmission of the treaty. It will not, in my judgment, interfere in the slightest degree with its ratification by the Senate. There is one thing, and one thing only, that prevents such resubmission and ratification to-day. That thing is the will of the President. He says: "Take the treaty as it is." He says: "The Senate reservations are unsatisfactory." Having returned from Paris and experience with the German envoys, he seems to say to the Senators, "Sign on the dotted line." Thereupon his followers in the Senate promptly vote against the resolution of ratification embodying protective reservations, and the necessary two-thirds vote is not secured. In other words, he declines to take the "advice" which the Senate in the performance of its duty under the Constitution has on two separate occasions been willing to offer him. It must be his way or no way; it must be his treaty or no treaty.

Now, grant, if you please, that some of the proposed reservations are unnecessary, what of it? Every one of them seems to be in the interest of an independent and self-respecting America. No one of them militates in the slightest degree against the principle of the League of Nations. No one of them is objected to by the nations associated with us in the war. Every one of them has been accepted by the friends of the league. Why, then, should the President himself object to them? Why delay the coming of peace; why postpone through weary, anxious months the resumption of normal business relations between men and nations? No good reason has been thus far suggested, and certainly none is perceived.

Of course, the President may have good reasons for not accepting the "advice" of the Senate. Some people do not need advice. They know it all in the first place. Macauley, you will remember, tells us of the eminent gentleman he has seen "come down with messages from God to the House of Commons." It would seem that the type has been known before. However, so far as the American people are concerned, the evidences are multiplying every day that they are about to indicate in unmistakable fashion that their experience with this type has been quite sufficient.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the war is over, and has been over for a year and a half, and yet legally and technically we are not yet at peace. The unfortunate controversy between the President and the Senate concerning the peace treaty has thus far prevented peace and kept us in a state of technical war long after the fighting is over. Our people are anxious to see the state of war ended; they want to see the autocratic power of the President ended; they want to see normal trade relations resumed; they want to see peace come again in law as well as in fact. The resolution under consideration looks to that end. It would recognize in law what the whole world knows is true as a matter of fact.

A treaty between this country and Germany would be the usual, normal, and perhaps the best method of bringing this about. But it is not the only way by which it can be done. The method proposed in the pending resolution is another way, even though it may not be so desirable a way. I do not say that the resolution under consideration is the best means of bringing about a state of peace, but I do say it is the best means now within our power. I do say it is the only means at all likely to be within our power before the 4th of next March.

But we are told, and the argument is pressed with great insistence, that Congress has no power to pass this resolution. Again and again we have been told in this debate that the President alone has power under the Constitution to end war. I do not believe this position is well taken, nor do I believe that the argument supporting it is sound.

Before going into that question, permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the first time that the Republican Party has been forced to meet such a challenge. Sixty years ago, at its very birth as a party, it was confronted with a similar situation. Then, as now, the welfare, if not, indeed, the safety and permanence, of the Government of the United States was in peril. Then, as now, it was said we had no power to meet the crisis. Then, as now, a Democratic President, obsessed with his theories, sat in the White House and said that Congress could do nothing. Then, as now, the Democratic Party took the position that we were in a "blind alley" and there was no way out. But Abraham Lincoln and the Republican Party found a way out. The Nation was saved and the "indestructible Union of indestructible States" was securely established.

I say to my friends on the Democratic side of the House, whatever sins of omission or commission you may charge against us, you can not truthfully say that from that day to this the infamous doctrine of impotence has ever for a single minute been a part of the platform, the policy, or the practice of the Republican Party.

Congress has ample power to pass this resolution. It is found in its powers "to declare war," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," and "to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." There seems to be no limit to the power of Congress in the premises.

Consider for a moment what would be the result of a different interpretation. Suppose there is a disagreement between Congress and the President as to the wisdom of continuing a war. Can it be said that the President has power to continue the war against the will of Congress? Or, on the other hand, suppose the President should enter into negotiations with the enemy to terminate the war which Congress did not wish to terminate. Will anybody say that such an effort on his part could by any possibility be successful? Surely not. It is the will of Congress that controls. The sword and the purse alike are in the hands of Congress and both are indispensable in the prosecution of war. To be sure, when war comes, Congress hands the sword to the President, but the Congress that gives can take back the sword whenever it wills. Congress and Congress alone determines whether our policy shall be one of peace or one of war.

As there may be war without a declaration of war, so there may be peace without a treaty of peace. Always there is a clear distinction between the fact of peace and the terms of peace. I say that the fact of peace now exists, and Congress, under its war powers and the general welfare and national-defense clause of the Constitution, may so declare. That is what we are trying to do by this resolution. But the terms of peace, except as they may be made conditions upon the right to resume commercial relations—these fall clearly within the treaty-making powers of the President and the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the people of this country are heartily tired of this disgraceful policy of "watchful waiting"; this pitiful display of "peanut politics," wherever exhibited, in a matter of such transcendent importance, of such vital and far-reaching concern to all our interests. While the President sulks in the White House, willing to make concessions at Paris, but apparently too proud to make concessions in the interests of the independent sovereignty of his own country, our people look to Congress for intelligent action. In this time of profound upheaval throughout the world, when loud and angry voices are heard on every hand, urging the overthrow of cherished institutions that it has taken us centuries to build, they turn their eyes hitherward in the hope and confident expectation that the dominant party in Congress—the party of Lincoln and Grant and McKinley and Roosevelt—will at least do its part to put an end to this bastard régime under which we have lived for 17 months and bring us again into the paths of peace.

I believe that we will meet and fulfill that expectation. I believe that we will not betray that trust. I believe that we will pass this resolution to-day. We have the constitutional right to do it. We have the moral right to do it. Thank God, we have the votes to do it, and it shall be done. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I desire to prefer a unanimous-consent request first. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my remarks a letter from a gentleman in Nebraska on the situation as disclosed by the acts of the administration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by incorporating a letter written to him by a gentleman in Nebraska. Is there objection?

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this gentleman from Nebraska a private citizen?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. He is a private citizen and a member of the gentleman's party. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman does not have to have unanimous consent for an extension of remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the request granted for unanimous consent yesterday was that it should not be matter other than a person's own remarks or suitable quotations.

Mr. MASON. Were the words "suitable quotations" used there?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the understanding of the request as the Chair understood it, that gentlemen were allowed to make quotations but not to extend letters or editorials or other matters besides that.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, governments are organized with a view to a long existence—if it may be—to be perpetual. Our Constitution was framed to aid in making our Government perpetual. Though it provides the machinery by which the Government functions, the perfection of this functioning will determine how long our Government will exist. If the Constitution receives a narrow construction and ceases to be flexible, does not have a comprehensive and liberal interpretation, it fails and governmental decay has begun.

With the purpose of the Constitution in mind each provision should be liberally construed to accomplish the desired result and achieve the end sought. When the general welfare of the Nation suggests that peace be brought about—and peace with honor is always a consummation devoutly to be wished—that purpose, peace, should be the guiding star in construing the powers contained within the Constitution.

It may be claimed that powers not granted are retained by the States, but this has reference to national affairs and not to international negotiations. A State, or all the States, except they act through the Executive, Congress, or the treaty-making power, could not have communication with another nation.

But the right to exist—or, if you please, self-preservation—is the first law of nations as well as of nature, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] conceded away his case when, in effect, he said, in answer to the gentlemen from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], that there was no remedy under conditions now present in our Government if neither President nor Senate recede.

To say that under our Constitution Congress can not declare a fact has ceased to exist which on a previous occasion under different conditions it had the power to declare did exist, the evidence in each case being the same—common knowledge of the fact with official notice or declaration of the fact conveyed by the President in an official message—is an application of a rule of construction that loses sight of the purpose in view when the Constitution was made the fundamental law of our land.

The war—physical war, force against force—has ended. The President has so declared officially.

The treaty has been negotiated by the President and presented to the Senate. After failure to ratify it has been returned to the President, who states that the "next move is with the Senate." In other words, we are at a deadlock, so far as ending the war by treaty is concerned. Under such conditions is peace technically impossible? Others have discussed the constitutionality of the "resolution," citing authorities conclusive as to the correctness legally of the position of the committee.

This resolution is in no sense a treaty, a part of a treaty, or an attempt to make a treaty. It does not end the war; that has already been done. It provides for the declaration of a fact that the President says exists and makes legal acts and commerce not now lawful between two peoples not now at war. It opens, conducts, or attempts no negotiations; it suggests no change of terms between Germany and the United States from those agreed to by the President. It leaves all international intercourse with the proper department of the Government. It will make it possible to have lawful business and intercourse between our people and another nation with whom we are not, in fact, at war.

This resolution, so far as actual war is concerned, is of no effect; that is, it changes no fact between Germany and the United States as to actual conflict. The conflict closed when the armistice was signed. When the opposition argue or assert that this resolution is an attempt at treaty making or that it is an attempt to declare peace, and therefore unconstitutional, it is only a smoke screen behind which it hopes to make its escape from its unpatriotic, its aristocratic, and its illogical position—a position against which the Democratic Party is almost in revolt, but which is made necessary to satisfy the Democratic schoolmaster's inordinate ambition to sit and rule as kaiser even as he rode the seas as one.

The Germans do not wish to fight Americans. They do wish to buy from our people. We do not desire to engage in mortal combat with the Germans—indeed, we have, by order of the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, brought home and disbanded our military forces, and they have returned to the ways of peace. We, too, would sell to Germany. No ally on either side objects; indeed, all earnestly desire to end this war technically and have peace and the ways of peace.

The President says he wants the war ended; so does the Senate, so does the House, and, above all, so do the people. Does our Constitution make us impotent to do what all departments of our Government and all the people want and our general welfare demands?

And here is where there should be an application of that principle which requires a broad and liberal construction of the instrument that its purpose may be carried out. If you apply the principle contended for by those on the other side of the House, then we never were at war by any constitutional declaration of war, because the action taken April 6, 1917, was not a declaration of war; it was a declaration that a state of war already existed. And, applying the narrow rule contended for by those against this resolution, there is just as much warrant in the Constitution to declare a state of war has ceased to exist as there was to declare a state of war existed; just as much and no more. Technically there is no express power to make either declaration, but to apply such a rule in either case is foolish and kills the spirit by the letter.

I wish to call to your attention the fact that there is not one thing in the resolution that has not been agreed to by Germany, all the Allies, the President, and the Senate. Let me repeat—to-day by this resolution no one is asked or required to do, or consent to, a single thing that has not been agreed to by all interested parties. Certainly the President and the Senate have agreed to it. All agree that the war is ended. All agree that diplomatic and commercial relations should be resumed and war legislation abrogated. No single element affecting the war and its ending is unsettled except the declaration of that fact by a proper authority, so that commercial transactions may be legally conducted and commerce resume its wonted way.

The only matters in dispute are things and conditions not mentioned or thought of as a cause of war. We did not go to war to establish a "League of Nations," but Germany has consented to even that. So have the Allies. We are still at war technically because the President and the Senate can not agree as to matters not related to the war or its cause. Does anyone claim that we must fight with another nation because our President and the Senate disagree, because they disagree about matters which do not touch even remotely the cause of the war between Germany and the United States?

In arriving at a decision as to the course to be pursued with reference to the adoption of this resolution declaring the fact that the war is at an end it matters nothing as to whether the President's or the Senate's action is wrong, or if both are wrong. It is not a sufficient reason that the covenant presents an administration policy. It was an American-fought war, and America, if it so desires, should have it ended technically, if actually it has ceased.

However, the administration's policies have not met with the approval of the people, and many of the Democrats disapprove of the administration's policies.

I received some time since from a Democratic constituent, W. M. Cain, Esq., of Fremont, Nebr., a letter containing comments which demonstrate the truth of this statement and which comments I quote:

In addition thereto—as we often say—have we not reared and delivered a man for "president of the world," who, "accompanied by Missus Wilson," of course, bade fair to "give us the heathen for our inheritance and the uttermost parts of the world for our possessions." Then, too, our progressive Josephus has inaugurated the interesting reversal of things by decorating the chap that does not fight but runs away. I suppose that by this curious innovation we may truly say that "defeat is swallowed in victory." That sir, is as it should be, for if we are "too proud to fight" and if we "thank God for our unpreparedness," why, then, should we not crown defeat and loathe victory?

Why, come to think of it, didn't we openly declare somewhere in the temporal vicinity of the sacred 14 points that we wanted "no victorious peace"? Seems to me we did so declare. So I affirm, upon my word as a Democrat (still), that we are at least consistent and logical. So it is, after all, quite right that Commander Bagley, who, pursuing the dogma of "peace without victory," sailed his craft in a hasty, if awkward, get-away from gunfire, should receive from the august hands of the Secretary of the Navy the distinguished service medal. Why not? If he steamed away from the scene of prospective—though not actual—conflict, he could leave the enemy to his wretched fate of nosing around the high seas until he could find some ship carrying the American flag whose commander had not learned the new idea of "no victory" and would not run. Of course, I don't care a damn about it, except—aye, there's the rub—except that Bagley's ship carried my flag!

It might be in the logical order of fightless victory and shootless guns and soldierless armies that we would have a valueless currency, but I don't believe it. The numerous "deserving Democrats" drawing limitless salaries for workless service would induce us to keep the dollars we are getting sound. So friend Luce is on the wrong track. Why don't he aim at those places in our armor that are worn so thin that "a pigmy's straw could pierce them"?

Look at our record again! Did the Republicans ever produce a president of the world? They did not. In all the successions of Republican administrations what progress did they make toward cultivating amicable relations with the Akhund of Swat or the Duke of Timbucto or the King of the Cannibal Isles down in the tropic seas? No progress whatever. And yet, in the brief span of less than four years, we Democrats have made them our blood brothers, invited them to our councils, and made ourselves their equals. This is little short of magic. Is it not? It is—not!

I asked unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks a letter from W. M. Cain, Esq., a Democrat and a citizen of the district I have the honor to represent.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] objected. I had desired, in justice to Mr. Cain, to insert the entire letter, as he had claimed for his party achievements with which I do not agree and which ought to appear to correctly set forth his attitude. As I am prevented from quoting the letter at large I have quoted the above as evidence of the disapproval I have mentioned and to challenge the attention of the other side of the House to this estimate placed upon the achievements of the present administration by members of that party in the hopes that it may have a beneficial effect.

This administration in the conduct of foreign affairs has not won the confidence of the people of the United States. Its conduct of foreign affairs has lacked an insight into and a comprehension of the matters involved and the ability to solve such problems as it did seem to understand. In Mexico it has been following a policy of "watchful waiting," which has consisted largely of waiting without watching, and were it not for the cries of outraged women and the graves of murdered citizens it might be allowed to pass by calling it "witless wabbling." Its chief protest has been letters so numerous as to waste almost enough paper to form winding sheets for the victims which its puerile policy has permitted Mexican outlaws and bandits to ravish and kill.

The President's triumphal procession with royalty through Europe, borne about upon the hard-earned or carefully saved dollars of American citizens and the shed blood of American soldier boys, the trip across the Atlantic with an exclusive company and an excluded soldiery, a discarding of the idea of open diplomacy and, indeed, nearly all of the sacred fourteen points, the threatening of a coordinate branch of our Government, backed by a record unsurpassed for its instability, does not suggest a great statesman and patriot, animated by a great idea, but rather an intensely selfish disposition, moved by an overweening ambition, and whose every move merits close scrutiny, and which, in this instance, with every advantage in his favor, has fallen so that now there is scarce one to commend him.

Indeed, if the party of this administration could have the people forget, it would flee from the record it has made as from a pestilence.

Recall and reconsider the conditions present: Germany had sunk our ships, murdered our women and children, and our Chief Executive, being "too proud to fight," opened a school for letter writing, in which he greatly excels. Germany continued to sink our ships and send our people to watery graves. Our Executive still taught letter writing, and so things continued until in 1917, when it could be borne no longer, and the Chief Executive informed Congress that a state of war existed and asked Congress to so declare, which it did. Mark you, there was in the prewar correspondence no dispute about any of the various provisions of the so-called "covenant," which the President has said must be accepted without dotting an "i" nor crossing a "t." The cause of the war was violations of international law—ships sunk and citizens murdered. Our boys, with courage unsurpassed, were instrumental in snatching victory from defeat. The war ends. An armistice is signed. A treaty is negotiated and signed by all parties engaged but United States and China, if my memory is correct. By the treaty terms Germany consents to everything the United States asks; all other nations engaged in that war consent to these arrangements.

To-day neither the United States nor the President is making any demand from Germany which in any way affects this war or its ending. There is nothing that the United States is to do to or for Germany. Yet with no cause for quarrel with Germany and with Germany having no cause for quarrel with us and with both peoples anxious to resume the ways of peace we must remain at war. Why? The answer of those who oppose this resolution must be, "Because Woodrow Wilson wishes to give England 6 votes to our 1 in the council of nations." Germany does not care or object to that. Why should we remain at war with Germany until Wilson can convince the American people that England is six times as intelligent as they are?

Why must we remain at war with Germany? Because Woodrow Wilson insists that when our enemies are invading our country or we are at war we can not increase the limit fixed for our military forces unless Spain and Japan and Italy and the other members of the council say so. Of course, Germany did not fight about that. But what do you think about remaining at war with Germany because the President insists on having the size of our armies fixed by foreign nations?

Why should we remain at war? Because Woodrow Wilson insists Japan must be permitted to steal Shantung from China. Germany does not care; she has given up all control and title thereto. God pity a party that has so far lost its self-respect and honesty that it insists on continuing a state of war to satisfy an unrighteous ambition of one of its own members and to aid another power to rob a weaker ally.

Why must we continue at war with Germany? Because Woodrow Wilson insists on placing in the hands of eastern nations, who are now criticizing us as a Nation and him as an individual and an officer, the right to enforce article 10 of the covenant against us as a guarantor of the territorial boundaries of every real estate grabber among European nations.

Why must we continue at war with Germany? Because Woodrow Wilson insists that the laboring people of the United States must go back to European standards and again develop along lines suitable to European, Asiatic, and African conditions. That we must without question accept the change made when the word "merely" was inserted in the following sentence: "But holding, as they do, that labor should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce," and so forth.

Why must we continue at war with Germany? Because Woodrow Wilson insists that in the construction and application of the Monroe doctrine to conditions as they shall arise in the future, European and Asiatic nations shall have full power to construe and apply that doctrine. We shall in all cases be the interested Nation, and hence without a vote. They now are and always have been against the doctrine. Imagine, if you can, Spain and Japan and Italy or even France and England sitting down in a judicial frame of mind to pass upon the application of the Monroe doctrine when one of their number had taken possession of the oil fields of Mexico or when Japan had purchased or taken a coaling station on the western coast of Lower California.

The American who hopes to get justice under such circumstances has made a prima facie case against himself before the insanity commission. Yet, before we may have peace with Germany we must, as a Nation, agree to this condition. God help America if this is to be a sample of its twentieth century diplomacy.

Why must we continue at war with Germany? Because Woodrow Wilson insists that after having allowed the European, Asiatic, and African countries to fix the size of our armies and navy, if perchance we are invaded or engaged in actual warfare before we could increase our Army or Navy, permission must be secured from European, Asiatic, and African nations in the council. Suppose war with Mexico. Do you find yourself able to imagine Japan hurrying to give the needed permission? Do you think that Spain will find herself in a position where she is convinced that we ought to have the help asked for? What would be Spain's influence on her daddy-in-law, England? What would Italy say and how quickly would she say it?

Does any man on this floor believe that the fate of our country is in safe hands so placed? Even now the echo of the cannon comes not faintly from European battle fields, started under rights claimed under this treaty and which are disputed by other signatories, allies in the late conflict. There are now under this covenant and treaty more serious disputes between practically all of the European nations than existed on July 26, 1914.

When you vote against this resolution and go to your home and your neighbor asks you why you so voted, tell him truly you wished England to have six votes in the assembly to our one; that you believe the laborer of our country should still wallow in the mire of European conditions; that you believe in the kind of national honor that aided Japan to steal Shantung from our ally, China, and after the theft was complete, in guaranteeing the thief in the possession of his loot; that we should give up the Monroe doctrine and send our boys to act as policemen for the Turks; and that we should bind ourselves and our posterity—because the covenant leaves with the council whether we have performed our obligations so as to retire from the "league"—to the tender mercies of those who hate us for our freedom, laugh at our simplicity, live off of our charity, and, until the Wilson administration, have damned our independence.

We all know the reasons I have enumerated are the real cause and the only cause the peace treaty is not signed. We all know that no one of these causes had any relation to the war. We all know that not a corporal's guard would vote in favor of adopting any one of them if presented so that a direct vote was required. But to save the political face of one who has abandoned nearly every policy he has espoused down to and including the sacred 14 points, almost the entire Democratic membership will, in this indirect manner, vote for them.

Where is that patriotism that is more potent than party fealty?

The time has come when we should be brave enough to do in the national legislative halls what our boys did on the battlefields—end the war. They carried that flag through the hell of war and returned it to you and to me and to our common country and never allowed it to dip to an enemy. Does it remain for the Democrats in Congress to bid our country bow to a foreign commander and kiss the hand that smites? I hope not, but if so, the mandate will be in vain.

The Republican Party would be pleased to join with the Democratic Party in keeping our sovereignty undivided and tributary to no foreign power. The Republican Party has never faltered when duty called. If need be, it will again maintain the dignity of our common country and prevent its bowing to any supersovereignty or its being made subservient to any other power.

Gentlemen of the House, let us adopt the resolution and "Let us have peace."

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BOIES].

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Speaker, I favor this resolution for the reason that the time has long since passed when peace with Germany might and should have been accomplished.

Peace with Germany could easily have been effected within six months or less, following the date of the signing of the armistice, but for the uncompromising and unusual purpose of the President to force the Senate of the United States to accept the covenant of the League of Nations as he presented it—"without the dotting of an 'i' or the crossing of a 't.'" This Government would long ago have been at peace with all the world, and in all probability a sane arrangement entered into by the leading nations of the world, guaranteeing the peace of the world, in so far as it is humanely possible, at one broad jump, thereby saving to the world billions of money and thousands of lives. That part of the world once known as civilized is now from 5 to 10 years further removed from normal conditions than it would have been had a peace plan been presented and adopted that contained the roots of reason, that appealed to the common sense of the people of the world, that was fitted to the practical uses and benefits of the people as we find them in the various countries of the world, that was the product of many of the best minds of the world, that had received the baptism of the thought, the reason, the suggestions, the mature deliberations of the master minds of the world in the broad and open sunlight of confidence and generosity "openly arrived at."

The all-absorbing question should have been, What do the people of my country desire? Aye, question upon question should have passed uncensored under the waters and through the heavens to this country, to the people, and especially to our Senators, whose advice and consent must finally have been heeded and secured.

The voice of the people still rules in this country. Threats and attempts to thwart the will of the people cause unrest and destroy business, and carry from safe moorings the radicals and the irresponsibles who are always eager for the chance to "raise the devil." But the great bulk of the American people finally bring about times that are right—under the authority of the Constitution, which points plainly the duties, responsibilities, and separate powers of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of this splendid Government—and which we love too well to discard or betray any of its functions into the hands of any foreign countries.

In most of the countries of Europe the heads of the government will, and the people acquiesce. It is different here. The will of the majority rules. In the secret negotiations at Paris the men of Europe naturally did not consult their people, and, judging from the result of that convention, as handed to America, they felt sure that the people of this country would calmly accept any trade contract carried away from the seat of fashion and gayety.

The men of Europe there assembled evidently never understood the station that the individual citizen occupies under our form of Government, nor did they interpret correctly the responsibility felt by the average officeholder toward the people and to the laws and the good order of the land. This must have been their attitude of mind, else they would have been unwilling to expend six months of time and as much money as it costs this Government, for the simple privilege of the six months of sociability at Paris. This may be getting separated a trifle from the serious side of the question. It is a mighty serious matter—so much time, and money, and rancor, and tribulation, and misunderstanding, and heartaches, and deception, and arrogance following, and nothing of first hope to come except disappointment, discord, and distrust. Such results are especially to be regretted when it was more important that harmony and good will prevail during the past year and a half than at any like period of time in the history of the world.

Had the peace with Germany been made when it should have been, Russia, Germany, Austria, and other countries, including our own, would have been in immeasurably better condition than they are to-day. Europe at war then is generally at war now, with 14,000 of our boys under arms in a foreign land; war-time laws disturbing the business of the country; war-time expenses yet piling up to be liquidated; unheard of prices oppressing the poor, the laborer, and the moderately well to do.

All hands must join, in good faith, if this great burden is to be lifted. In sight and hearing of it all we are told by the chairman of one of the two great parties in this country that this resolution must not pass; that notwithstanding the President's health he is able to reach the President when "crucial questions" arise, and that it will be folly for Congress to adopt this resolution because the President will veto it.

This position means nothing more than a "crucial question" in politics—that the League of Nations must be made an overshadowing issue in the coming campaign.

I predict that, in case this resolution is vetoed, and the President refuses to allow his followers to accept the proposed reservations to article 10, and a plank appears in the San Francisco platform placing the League of Nations before the voters of this country, the friends of the League of Nations, with or without reservations, will never see it presented to another Senate.

I am young in this business and my advice may be ridiculed and spurned, yet I believe that I have some knowledge of men, and my advice to the gentlemen of the minority of this House is that you have one chance to secure the adoption of the covenant of the League of Nations, with reservations, and that is, by forgetting your politics and voting your judgment upon this resolution, thereby informing the President that you can follow his advice no further on this question. You owe this to yourselves and to your country. Should you thus advise the President, the document, in my judgment, with the reservations, will be returned to the Senate within a week and will receive the "consent" that the Constitution requires.

My Democratic friends, if you do not now see the handwriting on the wall, you are blinder than a bat sitting on a street pavement at high 12 on a cloudless day with the Government thermometer standing at 119 degrees in the shade.

Really the handwriting I refer to, that should make any Democrat, high or low, quake in his "innards" who dreams of making the league an issue, is not on the wall, but appears upon the ballots most recently cast for Hiram Johnson. Can not you put two and two together?

If you bear such love for the President as tradition speaks, help to save his face; attend to it that the league is adopted with reservations.

Please do not answer that such action on your part "will break the heart of the world." England does not care a snap for the covenant of the League of Nations only in so far as it would require of this Government to bear a large part of the expense connected with the managing and bossing of that half of the world over which she presides.

France would rather be assured that under like circumstances this country, in the name of humanity, in the defense of womanhood, and in the love and adoration of the very name of mother, would come again and whole-heartedly, as France would come to us again in days like the time when Lafayette said to Washington, "We are here."

There are some things in this world broader and deeper and better than partisan politics. When the good of the country requires we should first and last and all the time be Americans.

Do not advance the empty argument that the adoption of this resolution will prevent securing a just settlement of property matters with Germany. The property now in our possession may be handled as justice dictates. Whatever else we might be entitled to will be settled as Germany may agree. The Congress, the people of this country, will not consent that we engage Germany in further bloodshed in order to possess ourselves of anything Germany might refuse to concede.

The President has taken undue advantage of his position to force the Senate to yield, having no regard for the Constitution or the rights and privileges of the Senators thereunder. He has had ample opportunity to draw the people to his way of thinking; he has worn himself out, destroyed his health, closed the doors upon himself and the orderly business of his Cabinet; he has stopped the wheels of progress and brought the world into a state of unrest by his prolonged insistence upon the adoption of a plan of world government that the people of this country will not assent to; and now threatens in advance the veto of a resolution to restore peace. Is it not about time that the man who claims to be so much interested in the freedom of men and of nations be required to remove his grip from the throats of those officers of this Government who regard their oaths as of some concern in the exercise of their duties?

Is it possible that one man can be in the right and the overwhelming majority of the American people wrong?

"Break the heart of the world?" Listen to the voice of France as contained in that great journal, the Paris Matin:

> At the most troubled moment in history America has a sick President, an amateur Secretary of State, and no treaty of peace. A President in the clouds, a Secretary of State in the bushes, and a treaty in the cabbage patch. What a situation! However, America is America; that is to say, our great sister nation, which has our love and eternal confidence. Colby or no Colby, treaty or no treaty, the American people know that we call them friends.
> It is only a little longer that a sick man will be able to keep the cloud in the sky above the two sister republics. And soon there will be a Secretary of State with whom Europe can speak and whom we can understand. France needs no written guaranty to know that America will send her boys again if we are menaced as we were in 1918, and let America know that we will send another Lafayette if she ever needs him.

The argument thus far has been an attempt to point to the necessity for the adoption of this resolution, rather than to the power of Congress to legally act in the premises. What is the legal phase? Among the powers conferred on Congress and delegated to no other branch of the Government is the power "to declare war." Nowhere is it found that the President has any voice in this matter. Nowhere is it found, by implication or otherwise, that the President can veto a declaration of war by Congress. It would be a most dangerous rule if the President held a veto power in this connection.

Section 1 of Article II of the Constitution provides, among other things, that—

> In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of his office, * * * the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and the Vice President.

Supposing a President should become wholly unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, and, in the interests of the country, it became imperative that the Congress by law provide for such an emergency, declaring the inability of the President to discharge the powers and duties of his office, would anyone contend that the President then in office and thus disqualified could veto such an act of Congress? If the question may rightfully be answered in the affirmative, we might be confronted with the case of a President wholly unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office and by his own veto obstruct the business of the office for four years. It appears that this is the only method by which a case of this character could be reached, as the Constitution provides for only three grounds of impeachment of the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, to wit:

> Conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

It might be contended that this provision of the Constitution only contemplates the voluntary resignation by the President during his inability to discharge the powers and duties of his office. If that is the construction to be placed upon the Constitution, then there is no way whereby the inability of the President can be determined except by his own admission and by his willingness to permit some one else to act until the disability be removed. If this part of the Constitution is meaningless and unenforceable, then certain it is that the Constitution should be amended. These provisions of the Constitution are cited in order to show that the third paragraph of section 7 of the Constitution does not apply when the clear language of the Constitution would be inoperative if controlled by said paragraph.

The Congress having absolute power "to declare war," it is an anomalous situation if Congress is not likewise empowered to declare that a state of war which it brought into existence is at an end. If Congress has not the power to so declare the state of war at an end, then a state of war once declared may continue indefinitely or until some President is found who would not veto a resolution by the Congress declaring that a state of war was ended. In this connection, as having some bearing upon the question at issue, it may be stated that Germany did not declare war against this country, and in such case a very different proposition would confront this Congress.

Laying aside the matter of the legal right of the President to veto the action of Congress in the event of the adoption of this resolution, what reason can be suggested why he should do so? Laying politics aside and looking to the welfare of this Government and to the needs and the wishes of the people of this country, there is no excuse for the rejection of this resolution.

The President may assign, as an excuse for vetoing the action of Congress, in case it adopts this resolution, that Congress, the legislative branch of this Government, is encroaching on the prerogatives of the Executive as related to his power to negotiate treaties. If this is the only reason that may be advanced for the exercise of the veto power lodged in the President, it probably will occur to the people of this country that the prerogatives and powers of the other branches of this Government have been so often usurped in past years as that it has lost its meaning, influence, and natural application altogether.

I shall vote for the adoption of this resolution because I believe that the people of this country are earnestly in favor of its adoption, for the reason that it will be of benefit to all matters of business in this country, for the reason that it is the right thing to do, and for the further reason that the peace with Germany should have been disposed of long ago and never "entangled" with the covenant of the League of Nations. The Senate of the United States possessed the undoubted right to pass upon both propositions, and separately without coercion or handicap of any kind or sort.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that there is no reason of any kind which will prevent my voting to establish officially that peace which the people of the country are demanding and for which the splendid men of our Army and Navy sacrificed so much; and I believe that no vote that I have cast since I became a Member of this House will come nearer meeting the unanimous approval of the people I have the honor to represent as the one I shall cast for this resolution declaring officially the state of war with Germany at an end and revoking the war-time powers of the President.

I regret that our friends on the Democratic side of this House are not to be allowed by their party to have the pleasure of voting for this resolution, for I know many of them would like to do so. It is unfortunate for the country that now that the Republican Party is in the majority the Democratic Members of the House must become obstructionists, opposing all measures we propose. This is so in the matter of appropriation bills. If because of the fact that they left us an empty Treasury, a national interest-bearing debt of $26,000,000,000, and a deficit between our yearly income and expenses of $3,000,000,000 we are forced to adopt a program of economy they at once try to prevent our carrying the same into effect. It was true with the railroad bill. The President having set March 1 as the time for returning the roads to their owners, it was the duty of the majority party to provide legislation governing such return and to enable the roads to continue to give service to the people; yet our Democratic friends obstructed and denounced us for doing what the needs of the country required, and so it is with this resolution.

The Nation has waited for 17 months since the armistice for a declaration of peace, yet now that our party has introduced this resolution the leaders on the Democratic side denounce it and write long technical briefs in an attempt to show that "we should not make a separate peace with Germany" and "that it is a violation of the Constitution." They overlook the fact that the President led our allies into a separate peace with Germany which they have already consummated but with which he interwove his League of Nations and made it impossible to us, because it destroyed our independence. So we are left but two alternatives—to either declare a separate peace or to delay until we can have a Republican President who will negotiate an American treaty.

In order to make their cry of "unconstitutionality" they point out that Congress has no power to make treaties, and then insist that this resolution is a treaty. Yet these same "constitutional objectors" applauded the President when he ripped open the Constitution and took therefrom the right of Congress to declare war and gave it to a League of Nations across the sea, dominated and controlled by a nation that was to have six votes to our one.

Is it possible we can pass a resolution stating that war exists, as this Congress did, and yet can not pass a resolution stating that it no longer exists? Or must we remain technically at war because the President insists upon having the treaty signed upon the dotted line?

Our Democratic friends say "the President will veto the resolution if we pass it, and we have not a majority large enough to pass it over his veto, and they will not help us to do so." Well, if this result comes I believe the people in November will give us both the Presidency and a two-thirds majority in this House. The people want peace; they want the unusual war powers which interfere with business and restrict free speech and American rights taken from the Executive. They are tired of a government of the President, by the President, and for the President. For my part I could not look the people I am representing in the face if I failed to vote for this resolution. I would feel that I was not loyal to the sacrifice of those who made this resolution possible. I shall vote for peace.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this resolution. The only criticism I make is that it was not introduced long ago. I favor it because the country demands it. I favor it because our financial, industrial, agricultural, and commercial interests demand it. I favor it because it is an absurd and silly thing to be technically at war and virtually at peace with Germany. I favor it because all our allies with whom we were associated in the late war have already concluded peace with Germany. Seeing that peace is eminently desirable, what, after all, is the real opposition to the passage of this resolution? When the situation is carefully analyzed it is seen to be solely the opposition of the President, the same opposition that led to months of vexatious delay in the matter of the League of Nations, and finally to its rejection, because one imperial will was set against the constitutional right of the Senate and the will of the people, even though our allies had openly declared that they would accept the league with the Lodge reservations.

While the world is in a vast turmoil, and is muddling along in confusion and uncertainty, our projects of reconstruction, involving not only those of this country but of world-wide inclusion, and the supreme necessity for coordination on the part of all the functions of our Government are delayed and even arrested, because of the strange and inexplicable attitude of the President.

The universal query on the lips of everyone at home and abroad is what sort of a Government now exists in the United States. Have we still a constitutional Government or a dictatorship? Have the legislative bodies lost their constitutional powers, or has all power passed into the hands of one man whose whims and desires have become supreme and who evinces a determination to evade the Constitution and all those precedents which time has sanctified for more than a century? I confess I am astounded and even dismayed at the situation, and am utterly unable to understand the position of those in this House who celebrate appropriatingly the memories of the fathers who formulated and delivered to us those splendid principles which we all, whether Republicans or Democrats, profess to revere and cherish. And more especially do I feel this when I see men sacrifice their own independence and gradually submit to encroachment after encroachment upon constitutional rights seemingly careless of their trust and weakly yield themselves to an autocratic will. I am called a Republican, but I yield to no Democrat a deeper and more sincere regard for the principles of a representative democratic Government which was so clearly enunciated by the framers of our Constitution.

In a representative democratic Government there should be no will but the will of the people, no force to prevail over that of the representatives of the people. A President is chosen by the same power which chooses the Members of this House. Under the fundamental law of the land they are each supreme in their respective spheres of action, but the whole spirit of the Constitution implies and demands a hearty and harmonious coordination of the three separate functions of our Government in order that the people may receive those blessings which can only flow from harmonious and coordinate action.

This resolution is not only right, but timely. The war is over. For all practical purposes it has been ended for a year and a half. This country alone is still technically at war because of the pique of one man, who seeks to thwart not only the popular demand, but the needs of the world because his own supreme will was not submitted to in the matter of the League of Nations.

The power to declare war lies in the Congress. The power to end war should be determined by the same authority, otherwise the declaration that this is a country where the people rule is a farce and that rule has been supplanted by the rule of one man. In this connection, in order to throw a bright light upon the subject of this resolution, I desire to quote as a part of my remarks the following editorial, taken from the Washington Post of date April 5, 1920, which, to my mind, furnishes an illuminating analysis of the resolution now under discussion:

Those who oppose the resolution which proposes to terminate the state of war and repeal the war powers of the President are beginning to dispute the constitutional right of Congress to make peace. They intend to attack the resolution on this ground. They hold that peace can be made only by treaty, which the President alone has the power to negotiate.

While there are features of the pending resolution which are open to criticism, it will be safer for its opponents to attack it on other grounds than those of constitutionality. A little analysis of the matter ought to convince any American that Congress can constitutionally exercise the power to make peace when necessary.

There is no limit to the powers of Congress in making war. Congress may do anything necessary to preserve the Nation's existence.

The power to make war is the power to preserve the Nation. The power to make peace is also the power to preserve the Nation, as would be demonstrated very quickly in case of a disastrous war.

The sword and the purse are held by Congress. It handed the sword to the Executive and told him to carry the war to a successful termination, which he did. Congress can take back the sword when it will.

War is a policy which can be adopted only by Congress. It is a continuation and development of a precedent policy, merely substituting force to accomplish what had been unsuccessfully sought by protest and warning. The Executive executes the policy declared by Congress, using the means provided by Congress and subject to the rules regulating the forces which are laid down by Congress.

The Executive can not terminate the policy any more than he can refuse to execute it. The policy may have been adopted over his veto, but it remains in effect until Congress decides otherwise. The termination of war must be in accordance with the policy of Congress, and therefore with the consent of Congress open or tacit. An attempt to terminate the war against the will of Congress would be equivalent to an attempt by the Executive to repeal the declaration of war.

The Executive and Congress may disagree as to the wisdom of continuing a war. The will of Congress controls.

Executive neglect, failure, or refusal to treat for the termination of war does not affect the power of Congress to determine the national policy and to change the policy from war to peace.

An Executive might treat for the termination of a war which Congress did not wish to terminate. His effort would be in vain.

Congress can by law direct the Executive to treat for the termination of war, in pursuance of the policy it has decided to execute.

War is usually terminated by a treaty, but not necessarily. But it is always terminated with the consent of Congress, and tacitly under its direction. This direction can be made explicit by law, but usually it is not necessary to do so.

The conduct of foreign relations is in charge of the President, operating through the Department of State. Congress created that department and can abolish it. But while the President is in charge of the conduct of foreign relations he is subject to law and he can not conduct foreign relations in violation of law. If Congress desires peace he can not prosecute war, and if Congress desires war he can not make peace.

The termination of war is the termination of the policy of force. The continuation of the policy may depend upon a foreign government but the termination can not be decided by a foreign government or by the Executive without the consent of Congress.

The Executive can not declare war or declare peace. He can proclaim either, but only in pursuance of law. If peace is made by treaty, it is law.

The reason why war is usually terminated by treaty is because it is usually desirable to treat with the enemy. But this is not always necessary or desirable. A treaty proposing to end war has just been rejected by the Senate, because it is not the policy of Congress to end the war on the terms stated in the treaty.

The Senate in making treaties acts according to the will of Congress. No treaty ending war can pass the Senate against the will of Congress, for the Senate is a part of Congress. The Senate does not possess two natures, although it exercises two powers. It exercises its share of the treaty-making power in harmony with its share of the lawmaking power. As the Senate helped to establish the policy of war, it will act according to its nature in dealing with that policy. As a lawmaker it can not favor war and then as a treaty maker favor peace.

Any treaty ending war, if acceptable to Congress, can readily pass the Senate.

The Executive can make treaties only if the Senate concurs.

Congress can make laws even if the Executive does not concur.

If Congress, in pursuance of its policy, determines to change from a state of war to a state of peace, and the Executive should refuse to cooperate in the treaty-making function, or if he should insist upon a treaty that would be equivalent to a refusal to execute the policy of Congress, then Congress can make peace by law instead of by treaty.

Any act of Congress is just as much the supreme law of the land as is a treaty.

The power to terminate war by law is an indispenable alternative. It does not disturb, deny, or destroy any of the powers of the Executive. It is available, however, in case he fails to exercise his powers or attempts to abuse his powers; as, for example, an attempt to continue a war by refusing to negotiate peace or by negotiating an unacceptable treaty for the purpose of having it rejected or by refusing to proceed with ratification of a treaty to which the Senate had attached reservations.

The question of policy always remains in the control of Congress, and by its power to overrule the Executive in the making of laws Congress can compel him to execute its policy of war or peace.

In my judgment the time has come—indeed, it has been too long delayed—when all of us here, we who came here as the representatives of the people and not as the representatives of an imperial will, should forget everything except our duty to the country. For my part, be he Democrat or Republican in the White House, I stand for the old-time powers and precedents. As long as I have a vote in this body I shall act as an independent representative commissioned by my constituents to observe their will. I have no other conception of my sworn duty as long as I believe that this should be a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House prate of unconstitutionality, suddenly and strangely sensitive to what they term an infraction of the Constitution, and yet silent and nerveless for a long time past under repeated assaults upon the same Constitution and those revered precedents which time has given a plain sanction to, equaling the force of constitutional laws themselves. This attitude can only be explained by assuming that they feared a conflict with the presidential will and at any cost determined to avoid it.

The gentlemen upon the other side who subordinate their wills and their judgments to one man, and by so doing rob their party of the last vestige of national confidence, present a spectacle so strange that one is almost led to believe in some malign fate following upon their footsteps. They say that this resolution is merely a declaration; that it will amount to nothing if passed; that it is void in law; that it is a trespass upon the constitutional rights of the President and the Senate; and that its design is solely to embarrass the President. Let us leave out all these considerations except the last. Why should not the President be embarrassed? For long months he has embarrassed not only this country but the world. Has the time come when the whims and desires of one man become of such supreme importance that a royal consideration must be extended to him while grave matters affecting the public welfare are held in uncertain abeyance? And yet this is what we are asked to do.

The illness of the President is used as an excuse for opposing all legislative action contrary to the President's will. If criticism of this condition occurs, a hot flame of indignation flows from the mouths of his partisan and sycophantic supporters, charging against such critics a lack of the commonest decencies and sensibilities of human intercourse and an absence of the very commonest instincts of kindness and sympathy. If true, this charge would be shameful. The facts are the President is ill under certain circumstances and should be almost reverently considered, and under other circumstances he is in such a splendid state of mentality that all other minds should cease to function and his alone be allowed to determine every domestic and world-wide problem.

I desire to make this declaration: The Members of this House, and those of the Senate, can not intelligently discharge their duties to the country without keeping in mind the peculiar temperament and mentality of the President. At a time when counsel, wisdom, and the heartiest coordination is demanded, it is lacking, because the President will have nothing but his own way. It is not necessary to dwell upon this. Multitudinous facts are known to every American, substantiating this declaration, and thousands more to be found in Europe during the President's sojourn there. There is no doubt, and no one on calm reflection and with an informed mind can escape the conclusion, that the President by his peculiar quality of mind and temperament became at the most critical need of the world its greatest marplot. Long continued and glowingly voiced altruism, including those 14 alkaloidal extracts of human righteousness in government, were gradually given away under the delicate but keen and cold manipulation of those astute representatives of England, France, Italy, and Japan. Recognizing as they did the voracious ambition of the President to become the first President of a united states of the world, they fed his vanity to repletion, tricked him at every point, and gave him the empty shell of a righteous League of Nations, while they robbed the world and at the same time obtained the President's assent thereto. The argument is advanced that the President's pledges and promises should be made good because those to whom he made them accepted them in good faith. This is an outrageous argument. It is not to be believed for a moment that such men as Lloyd-George, an Englishman, and acquainted with the constitutional history of this country by reason of our historical relations to his own, or Clemenceau, who spent years in this country, breathing the life and the spirit of our laws, nor in fact Sontino nor the Mikado were not aware of the supreme fact that the President of the United States had no power to bind the Senate of the United States in the making of treaties, and also of the further fact that historically no former President had ever dared to assume such power. The President went across the ocean to match minds. It is perfectly plain now how that mind matching concluded.

I desire to call attention to another fact of supreme importance which ought to be more and more considered. When the armistice was signed we possessed the confidence, the esteem, and the profound gratitude of all our allies, at least in Europe. To-day we have inherited by reason of the regrettable pilgrimage of the President in Europe general scorn and blame. The President's stay in Europe was one of royal magnificence. The American entourage was more costly than that of kings. His seclusion was that of an august potentate. He had more than a thousand in his royal train, and took the advice of none of them. He journeyed hither and thither attracting great crowds of the proletariat, who followed him as a Pied Piper of Hamlin, hanging upon his lips, entranced and exalted, by reason of the glorious things that would be born out of his conception of a supergovernment of the world. He threatened established governments, forgetful that they had just been recently confirmed by the will of their respective peoples, while he himself had been repudiated.

This attitude of arrogance and of power was unutterably deplorable. While the President was dwelling in an unreal world of his own creation the representatives of England, France, Italy, and Japan—those mastercraft men in the arts of diplomacy—were not only stealing every one of the principles of the 14 points from under the President's nose and executing the most monstrous and colossal territorial grabbing scheme that the world had ever known, but were themselves looting and robbing, and in such a way, notably in the Shantung matter, as to build up and make great the potential power of Japan, which England is undoubtedly designedly doing in order to have a club over the head of this country in the future.

For our money and our dead we traded off confidence and friendship for scorn and ill will and territorial adjustments that will serve as a serious menace to our future peace.

The time has gone by for further inaction. If the President be of sound mind, and if the only obstacle to peace and to reconstruction is an imperial determination to have his own way regardless of the will of the Senate and of the House and of the whole people, this resolution should be passed as quickly as possible. If the President's mind is unsettled, and if he no longer can think and act in a normal way responsive to the needs and the necessities of the country at large, this resolution should be all the more quickly and promptly passed or the strange spectacle of a Government without a normal mind at the head of it will be presented to the gaze of the whole world. It will be a spectacle of a representative democracy drifting along like a ship in the turbulent waters of a stormy sea without a pilot. The plea is made that we have no constitutional right to make a peace treaty in this House; that that power is reserved for the President and the Senate. This resolution makes no treaty. It simply sanctions and approves in a solemn way the terms of peace already approved by the President and all our allies in the late war.

The crux of the matter is that the President does not want a peace treaty without his own particular League of Nations. He has openly declared that he would so interweave his scheme for a League of Nations with the peace treaty that both would have to be taken or neither of them. The country wants the peace treaty but does not want the President's particular brand of a League of Nations. This is as manifest as a fact can be, and is evidenced on every hand by the public press and the declarations of the people whenever they have had an opportunity for expression. But this state of facts makes no impression upon the presidential mentality. He cares nothing for the constitutional rights of the Senate, nothing for the desires and necessities of the people. Like a dictator, he is bent, at any cost, on having his own way.

This resolution simply expresses what the country wants. It is a proper expression of the popular will. If passed, it will serve not only to calm the people here but to give to other countries a proper understanding of the will and purpose of this country, which the President so continuously and so grossly perverted while abroad. If the resolution is new as to precedents, it can be said that the present situation is new also. It is time when the sincerest and wisest thought in the country, regardless of partisanship or politics, should be united in a common purpose, not for our national welfare only, but for world-wide good. At this time when, to a greater degree than ever, the three branches of Government should be in the most harmonious accord, the Government of the country is largely impeded in every proper function by the imperial, or impaired, mind of one man, and those necessary and imperative steps looking to the restoration of peace with Germany, and the reconstruction necessarily demanded after the late war of such fearful magnitude are arrested.

Finally, the situation is this: The President says, "You shall have no peace with Germany and her allies unless you take my League of Nations with it." The Senate says, "We will not take your League of Nations unless it is properly safeguarded by such reservations as shall preserve our old-time independence and liberty." In reply, the President says, "I will throw the whole thing into the campaign as a political issue, and keep in the seclusion of the White House while I pray that some other war will break out, so that I can point to it as a proof of my foresight and wisdom and the foolishness of the Senate and the people." All of which means the country has for a President one who, regardless of every demand of the hour, demands his own way. What is the remedy for this anomalous situation? It is clearly to pass this and all other proper legislation that will reassure the country, and then wait patiently on time and the dispensation of Divine Providence and the American voter for the certain solution of this unprecedented problem.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I heartily indorse the pending resolution and count it a rare privilege to assist in its passage.

It reads as follows:

[H. J. Res. 327, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session.]

Joint resolution terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States; permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Whereas the President of the United States, in the performance of his constitutional duty to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, has advised the Congress that the war with the Imperial German Government has ended:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

SEC. 2. That in the interpretation of any provision relating to the date of the termination of the present war or of the present or existing emergency in any acts of Congress, joint resolutions, or proclamations of the President containing provisions contingent upon the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, the date when this resolution becomes effective shall be construed and treated as the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, notwithstanding any provision in any act of Congress or joint resolution providing any other mode of determining the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency.

SEC. 3. That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with the German Government and its nationals, and for this purpose, it is hereby provided that unless within 45 days from the date when this resolution becomes effective the German Government shall duly notify the President of the United States that it has declared a termination of the war with the United States and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles, the President of the United States shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to proclaim the fact that the German Government has not given the notification hereinbefore mentioned, and thereupon and until the President shall have proclaimed the receipt of such notification, commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany and the making of loans or credits, and the furnishing of financial assistance or supplies to the German Government or the inhabitants of Germany, directly or indirectly, by the Government or the inhabitants of the United States shall, except with the license of the President, be prohibited.

SEC. 4. That whoever shall willfully violate the foregoing prohibition whenever the same shall be in force, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; and the officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation shall be punished by a like fine, imprisonment, or both, and any property, funds, securities, papers, or other articles or documents, or any vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment, concerned in such violation, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as a waiver by the United States of any rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which the United States has become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States by reason of its participation in the war, or otherwise; and all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States are hereby ratified, confirmed, and maintained.

This resolution recalls great historical events. Most of us sat upon the floor of this House on the 2d of April, 1917, to hear the message of the President of the United States in relation to the momentous questions that were then endangering the civilization of the world. As we listened to the words of President Wilson at that time and reflected upon the grave consequences involved we found it impossible to banish from our minds the words "he kept us out of war."

Let the American literature of 1916 be flashed upon the screen in contrast with that war message of April 2, 1917. Let the citizenship of America to-day consider calmly and thoughtfully the significant examples therein revealed. In the midst of such reflections an irresistible exclamation forced itself into expression, "What a change!" Immediately the thoughtful mind began to search for the reasons and to weigh the consequences of the future.

The war resolutions passed quickly through the House and Senate and were approved by the President April 6, 1917, three years ago last Tuesday. Great events followed one another in rapid succession as the Army, the Navy, the financial, the industrial, the commercial, and the agricultural affairs of the Nation sprang into lively activity for the mobilization of an Army and a Navy of adequate proportions, and also the mobilization of the financial resources of the country to furnish the sinews of the war. Never had the dogs of war been unleashed in such a mighty contest before.

Our country was speedily transformed from an era of peace into an era of war, death, and destruction. The smiling countenances, the merry laughter, the good cheer, the happiness, the plans, and the hopes of a day of peace were speedily exchanged for sorrowing faces, tearful eyes, sad voices, throbbing hearts in the opening days of war.

Fathers and mothers, young men and young women, have laid aside the cheerfulness of the day of peace and now breathe the sadness of the days of war. Young men by the millions turned sorrowfully from their homes to the camps and fields of battle. What did it all mean? Must this tremendous price in treasure and life be paid that liberty and free government may live? What has entered into the soul of humanity that forces this unspeakable cruelty into the experiences of human life? Does it cost more to subdue human passion and deliberate destruction of life and property than it does to supply all the peaceful agencies of government? Such is the sad commentary upon the civilization of the world.

Notwithstanding these grave consequences American boys by the million marched bravely to the front and carried our flag of liberty across the ocean to the field of contest on European soils, and helped to destroy tyranny, monarchy, and oppression. American girls by the thousand and hundreds of thousands turned aside from their schools and ordinary vocations of life, comfort, and ease to help in war work at home. Many of them went to the front with their gentle ministrations of kindnesses, sympathy, and helpfulness in the midst of the contest. But since the victory and signing of the armistice on the 11th of November, 1918, what progress have we made toward the reestablishment of safe and sane government throughout the world? This period of reconstruction is quite as important as the war period itself. Calmness and patient loyalty to human rights under free government are essential characteristics that must be molded into the citizenship of the nations of the world.

In the midst of this period of reconstruction came the consideration of the treaty of peace and a League of Nations. Never in all the history of the world was broad, intelligent, Christian statesmanship needed more imperatively than it was at that great crisis. Those great problems demanded broad-mindedness, the absence of selfish ambitions, the absence of autocratic, dictatorial manifestations of individuality. We waited patiently and anxiously during the months covered by the sessions of the peace commission in Paris. Debates upon great problems were passing to and fro in the meantime. On the 10th of July, 1919, the President submitted to the American Senate the treaty of peace with Germany interlaced with a covenant for a League of Nations.

It would be unduly painful to attempt to rehearse even a small portion of the debates that have followed on that subject in the Senate and throughout the country. An opportunity appeared last October for the ratification of that treaty of peace and the League of Nations with mild reservations, but the representatives of the President on the floor of the Senate rejected all overtures and the debates went on. By and by a decisive majority of the Senate adopted reservations and embodied them in a resolution of ratification. When the treaty and covenant for the League of Nations was submitted under that resolution with the reservations the administration directed its rejection, and so it passed to defeat in the Senate on the 17th of December, 1919. Within a few weeks it was resurrected from the files of the Senate, brought forward in the second attempt to secure ratification, but after prolonged discussion the administration again directed its rejection, and accordingly on March 19, 1920, it was rejected a second time and returned to the President with an official notification that the Senate had failed to advise and consent to its ratification. It has been since that time in the possession of the President, with no indication that any movement will be made by him to secure ratification upon terms agreeable to the Senate.

As the President and the Senate are clothed by our National Constitution with coordinate powers in making treaties with foreign Governments, each has its right under the Constitution to exercise its judgment according to its own convictions.

So far as we are able to understand conditions at this time there is no prospect of an agreement between the President and the Senate upon this important question.

Each of us, therefore, as Members of the House, having no authority in the matter of the ratification of the treaty, must exercise individual judgment as to our duty in relation to the decision of peace between the United States and Germany. Nearly 17 months have elapsed since the signing of the armistice, and yet we are technically at war with Germany.

For myself I regard it as my imperative duty to vote for the adoption of this resolution as a means of removing that legal technicality which holds our Nation constructively at war with the German Government. Personally I have been from the outset, and I am now, in favor of the ratification of the covenant for a League of Nations with such reservations as will harmonize it fully with our National Constitution, the Monroe doctrine, and the settled policies that have made our Nation strong and great.

When that document was submitted to the Senate two extremes immediately manifested themselves—unqualified ratification on the one hand and unqualified rejection on the other. Investigation and discussion brought a majority of the Senate to a compromise midway between the extremes. Certain reservations were agreed upon and adopted by a decisive majority of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein). That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers, and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers:

1. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any forms of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provide.

3. No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, part 1, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

6. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles.

7. No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible, as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties.

8. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply to the United States' proportionate share of the expense of the office force and salary of the secretary general.

10. No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress, and the United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than such covenant-breaking State, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

12. Nothing in articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto, or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany, shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

13. The United States withholds its assent to Part XIII (articles 387 to 427, inclusive) unless Congress by act or joint resolution shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said Part XIII, and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.

14. Until Part I, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate shall be entitled to cast, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate have cast more than 1 vote.

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

15. In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when such government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

These reservations were inserted in the resolution of ratification by a majority vote.

In this connection I urge the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle to read and study the clear, forceful speech delivered by Senator HOKE SMITH of Georgia and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for March 19, 1920, pages 4588 to 4593.

Those reservations expressing the deliberate judgment of a decisive majority of the Senate should have been accepted and the covenant ratified upon that basis long ago. A refusal to accept the rule of the majority is a positive declaration that the minority shall rule. No one can consistently advocate democracy and the rule by the minority at one and the same time. He may say, "Make the world safe for democracy," but at the same time he says, "Make America safe for autocracy"—rule by the minority, even one person.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD demonstrates that the treaty of peace with Germany and the proposed covenant of the League of Nations could have been ratified last October, also on the 17th of last December and again on the 19th of last March with the Senate reservations, if the will and recorded judgment of a decisive majority of the Senate had been permitted to control.

Since a minority has repudiated the rule of the majority and thus substituted autocracy for democracy, ratification by the Senate under existing conditions seems impossible. The House, therefore, should go to the full limit of its authority in the restoration of peace by repealing the war resolution enacted by the House and Senate and approved by the President on the 6th day of April, 1917. Such action will prepare the way for the repeal of the oppressive war statutes which clothed the President with arbitrary and dictatorial power. The business and citizens of the country should be relieved as speedily as possible from those oppressive war measures.

It has been stated on the other side of the aisle that the passage of this resolution will be an embarrassment to the President. He can avoid all embarrassment by signing the resolution as soon as it reaches the White House. If the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle wish to remove their embarrassment, let them vote for the resolution, and we will give the country the peace that it has been demanding for many months. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin already has that privilege.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the attainment of peace with its manifold blessings is a consummation devoutly to be wished. But peace at any price, peace in violation of the Constitution, peace in usurpation of vested constitutional authority, peace contrary to all the honored precedents and established forms of the American Government is more to be despised by a great and courageous people than to be desired. On yesterday gentlemen loudly exclaimed that the people demand peace. The American people do demand peace, but they demand a constitutional and an honorable peace. They are not now, and will never be, willing to destroy the constitutional basis of the American Government, conceived in the wisdom and experience of our fathers, in order to gain the accomplishment of any end, and much less the accomplishment of the ambitious aims of a political party seeking to ride through popular favor over constitutional authority into political power.

Loud complaint was made here yesterday that all the allied nations are now at peace with Germany, while America is technically still at war. All the other allied nations were wise enough to ratify the treaty of peace, while America, bound and fettered by designing politicians, has been held back while those politicians gambled on the destiny of our country over the graves of our soldiers who died that America might live. The Constitution expressly provides that the President shall have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. No one surely, I presume, will say that the House of Representatives has any authority whatever in the negotiation, making, or ratification of treaties. The sole question then remains whether the joint resolution, or declaration of peace, under consideration, if consummated, is a treaty. The consensus of all authority is that a treaty is an agreement made by negotiation or diplomacy; specifically, an agreement, league, or contract between two or more States or sovereigns, formally signed by representatives duly authorized, and solemnly ratified by the several sovereigns, or the supreme power of each State, unless the treaty is personally concluded by the sovereigns or other persons exercising the sole treaty-making power.

The joint resolution before the House provides, among other things, that Germany must accept the terms thereof within 45 days from the date when the resolution becomes effective, and unless Germany does accept or agree to said terms then the United States shall prohibit commercial intercourse between this country and Germany, also prohibit the making of loans or credits, and the furnishing of financial assistance or supplies to the German Government or the inhabitants of Germany. It is clear, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that in order to make this resolution effective Germany must acquiesce in and agree to the terms of the resolution. Hence, the joint resolution here proposed is an attempt by the House of Representatives to negotiate a treaty; an attempt to usurp the functions of the President and the Senate of the United States; an attempt to violate the Constitution and here set up, in defiance of constituted authority, an arbitrary power. This daring political move on the part of the dominant party in this House; this open defiance of constituted authority; this bold attempt at usurpation of vested constitutional authority finds no precedent anywhere in all the annals of American history.

In every instance where the United States was involved in war with a foreign nation the termination of that war was affected through a treaty of peace. The Revolution terminated in the treaty of Paris, September 3, 1783. Following the War of 1812, President Madison, availing this Government of the offer of Russia as mediator between the United States and Great Britain, nominated, as envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, Albert Gallatin, James A. Bayard, and John Quincy Adams. The President forwarded to the Senate, May 29, 1813, the nominations made for confirmation. On July 19, 1813, the Senate confirmed the nominations with the exception of Gallatin. Subsequently the British Government refused the mediation of Russia and sought to treat directly with our Government. The President proceeded immediately to nominate John Quincy Adams, James A. Bayard, Henry Clay, and Jonathan Russell as the commissioners to effect a treaty of peace with the British Government. On January 18, 1814, four days after the nominations were made, the Senate confirmed them. On February 9, 1814, Gallatin was again named by President Madison, and his nomination was duly confirmed. The treaty of Ghent was signed on December 24, 1814, and unanimously ratified by the Senate on February 16, 1815.

Directly following the victory of American arms at Buena Vista, in the Mexican War, President Polk appointed Nicholas Trist as a representative to negotiate a treaty of peace with Mexico. The President and his Cabinet drafted a treaty, and on April 16, 1847, Trist, in secrecy, and traveling under an assumed name, went to New Orleans with the treaty. The Mexican authorities refused this treaty and offered in lieu thereof another treaty. Finally, February 2, 1848, Trist succeeded in concluding a treaty with the Mexican plenipotentiaries, and the Senate ratified this treaty on March 10, 1848, which is known as the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The Spanish-American War was concluded in the treaty of Paris, December 10, 1898, and was ratified by the Senate of the United States February 6, 1899. No attempt heretofore has ever been made by any Congress to transgress the Constitution in the settlement of any war or concluding of peace.

In the War with Mexico there was much opposition in the United States to the prosecution of that war. Efforts were made through Congress to terminate the war. These efforts, it is claimed, were not altogether honest, but used as instruments to embarrass and discredit the administration. These efforts, however, do not come up to the high-handed proceedings here proposed, but consisted in measures to terminate the war by cutting off or limiting appropriations and efforts to exercise pressure on the President by political strategy and maneuvering. These efforts were designed to so cripple the Chief Executive as to render further prosecution of the Mexican War impracticable or impossible. The joint resolution before us seeks not only to embarrass the Chief Executive but to usurp the authority expressly vested in him and in the Senate by the Constitution. It is a deliberate effort to negotiate a treaty of peace with Germany, and it is surprising that the joint resolution fails to nominate certain persons as ambassadors and ministers plenipotentiary to Germany.

Permanent peace following a war can only be properly attained by negotiation of a treaty. In the event the proposed legislative act passes and is signed by the President, then Germany, within 45 days, must enact a corresponding declaration of peace, in terms accepting and agreeing to the provisions set forth in the joint resolution. Such a peace would be one without definite conclusions—a peace fraught with a multitude of lawsuits over alien property and property rights, countless complications arising from German vessels seized and in American ports—in short, it would be an inconclusive, unsettled, disjointed, undefined peace. After the inhuman sinking of the Lusitania America specifically entered the war in order to maintain the rights of our ships as a neutral nation upon the high seas, and the rights of American citizens on foreign commercial vessels sailing the high seas to be protected against submarine warfare. These rights Germany bitterly disputed and launched forth her unrestricted submarine warfare. If this resolution is to be the treaty for the conclusion of peace with Germany, none of these indisputable rights will be established; the millions of dollars of alien property in custody will become involved; the $25,000,000 of seized German vessels will be a subject of dispute, together with countless complications that will inevitably arise. The brand of peace proposed would indeed be a makeshift, charged with innumerable embarrassments and guillotining the glorious victory we achieved at such a tremendous sacrifice in money, blood, and life.

Such a consummation would be the negotiation of a separate peace with Germany, regardless of and ignoring our allies. However much we may conjecture as to such a peace, we but waste time and spend our thoughts in extravagant waste. It is utterly impossible to conceive that any President of the United States would ever sign such a document. The presidential veto, to all sane men at least, is a foregone conclusion, and the American people will loyally, patriotically sustain him in that veto. No political party can commit a travesty on law, defeat constitutional authority, and maintain the confidence and respect of the people. Such an unwise procedure in an endeavor to blind the people is but a rude makeshift and will fail to stiffly bear them up.

Is there any man here so unwise as to believe the President would sign such a resolution? Or is there any man here so foolish as to believe that two-thirds of either House would pass such a resolution over his veto? Miserable scapegoat for duties unperformed by the dominant political party! It is only a seductive whirlpool, fraught with countless dangers to the Republic had it the semblance of passage; but impotent and impossible as it is, it resolves itself into a political trick and scheme which inevitably must turn upon its creator to wreck a much-deserved punishment and chastisement.

It is contended by some, as was asserted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] on yesterday, that he favored the resolution, and presumably for two reasons: First, because public sentiment demands peace, and second, because "the people continue to groan under harsh and restrictive war laws." In answer to his first assignment, let me say to the gentleman that the American people are averse to the conclusion of any peace other than an honorable one; a peace in violation of the Constitution is not an honorable peace. As to his second contention, let me say that it is not essential to the repealing of burdensome war measures that a peace resolution should be passed. The Republican Party could long ago have repealed these war measures had they desired to have done so.

Let us hope that constitutional procedure will be the only course America will follow. In that no question is ever settled until it is settled right, let us hope that the President and the Senate will yet negotiate a righteous peace, preserving all the rights that American soldiers fought and died for, and for which the American people sacrificed and prayed. Gentlemen, lay aside, in this solemn hour of the Republic, partisanism and political hatred—assume a virtue, if you have it not. Though ardent in politics and zealous for coming victory, let these ambitions not usurp your patriotism as your resolution seeks to usurp constituted authority. Let patriotism, wisdom, and unity of purpose prevail in this crucial period for the common good and the glory of the Republic.

When the proposition of the passage of this resolution is based upon a purely legal and constitutional status the position of those who favor the resolution is absolutely untenable, while the position of those opposed to the resolution is sustained by precedent, the Constitution of the United States, and every authority on international law. As a part of my remarks, I herein embody a memorandum furnished me by the Library of Congress, as follows:

Memorandum relative to the power of Congress to declare a state of peace through the agency of a joint or a concurrent resolution.

This question, it appears, was really anticipated in the discussion in the Federal Convention on August 17, 1787, with regard to the powers that should be bestowed upon Congress. The following excerpt taken from Madison's Journal is illuminating:

"To make war

"Mr. Pinkney opposed the vesting this power in the legislature. Its proceedings were too slow. It would meet but once a year. The House of Representatives would be too numerous for such deliberations. The Senate would be the best depositary, being more acquainted with foreign affairs, and most capable of proper resolutions. If the States are equally represented in Senate, so as to give no advantage to large States, the power will notwithstanding be safe, as the small have their all at stake in such cases as well as the large States. It would be singular for one authority to make war and another peace.

"Mr. BUTLER. The objections against the legislature lie in a great degree against the Senate. He was for vesting the power in the President, who will have all the requisite qualities and will not make war but when the Nation will support it.

"Mr. M[adison] and Mr. Gerry moved to insert 'declare,' striking out 'make' war, leaving to the Executive the power to repel sudden attacks.

"Mr. Sherman thought it stood very well. The Executive should be able to repel and not to commence war. 'Make' better than 'declare,' the latter narrowing the power too much.

"Mr. Gerry never expected to hear in a Republic a motion to empower the Executive alone to declare war.

"Mr. ELLSWORTH. There is a material difference between the cases of making war and making peace. It should be more easy to get out of war than into it. War also is a simple and overt declaration; peace attended with intricate and secret negotiations.

"Mr. Mason was against giving the power of war to the Executive, because not [safely] to be trusted with it, or to the Senate, because not so constructed as to be entitled to it. He was for clogging rather than facilitating war, but for facilitating peace. He preferred 'declare' to 'make.'

"On the motion to insert 'declare' in place of 'make' [it was agreed to].

"N. H., no; abst.; Cont., no; Pa., ay.; Del., ay.; Md., ay.; Va., ay.; N. C., ay.; S. C., ay.; Geo., ay. [Ayes 7, noes 2, absent 1.]

"Mr. Pinkney's motion to strike out whole clause, disagd. to without call of States.

"Mr. Butler moved to give the legislature power of peace, as they were to have that of war.

"Mr. Gerry 2ds. him. 8 Senators may possibly exercise the power if vested in that body, and 14 if all should be present, and may consequently give up part of the U. States. The Senate are more liable to be corrupted by an enemy than the whole legislature.

"On motion for adding 'and peace' after 'war.'

"N. H., no; Mas., no; Ct., no; Pa., no; Md., no; Va., no; N. C., (no); S. C., no. [Ayes 0, noes 10.]

"Adjourned."

In this connection, Dr. William Rawle, in his view of the Constitution (Philadelphia, 1829, p. 110–111), remarks:

"Treaties by which peace is completely restored may, as already shown, be made by the President and Senate alone, without the concurrence, and against the will of the House of Representatives.

"It has been made a subject of doubt whether the power to make war and peace should not be the same, and why a smaller part of the Government should be entrusted with the latter than the former. Sufficient reasons may certainly be assigned for the distinction. Peace is seldom effected without preparatory discussion, often of length and difficulty, the conduct of which, of course, belongs only to the President and Senate. War is always an evil; peace is the cure of that evil.

"War should always be avoided as long as possible, and although it may happen to be brought on us before observed, without the previous assent of Congress, yet a regular and formal war should never be entered into without the united approbation of the whole Legislature. But although a peace is seldom obnoxious and unacceptable to the public, yet its necessity or propriety may not always be apparent, and a public disclosure of the urgent motives that really exist in favor of it, may be prejudicial. The people have, in such case, a stronger motive for relying on the wisdom and justice of the President and Senate, than in the case of ordinary treaties. They are less likely than a larger body to be influenced by partial views or occasional inflammation, and the very circumstance of the smallness of their numbers increases their responsibility to public opinion."

Mr. Joseph Story, in his valuable Commentaries on the Constitution (Boston, 1872, p. 88), contributes the following:

"SEC. 1173. In the convention, in the first draft of the Constitution, the power was given merely 'to make war.' It was subsequently, and not without some struggle, altered to its present form. It was proposed to add the power 'to make peace,' but this was unanimously rejected upon the plain ground that it more properly belonged to the treaty-making power. The experience of Congress, under the confederation, of the difficulties attendant upon vesting the treaty-making power in a large legislative body, was too deeply felt to justify the hazard of another experiment."

Mr. J. I. C. Hare, in his treatise on American Constitutional Law (Boston, 1889, p. 171–172), first contrasts the systems of government in the United States and England, and then with reference to the President of the United States he adds: "He is as much the representative of the entire people of the United States as any Member of Congress can be of his district, and should therefore exercise the discretionary powers confided to him by the Constitution in the way that he may deem best calculated to promote the welfare of the country, which may not be the way deemed best by Congress. Take, for instance, the case of a war which Congress thinks unnecessary or unjust and wishes to close on terms that the enemy are willing to accept. Still, it is the right of the President, and not of Congress, to determine whether the terms are advantageous, and if he refuses to make peace the war must go on."

The legal authorities on international law, heretofore referred to, holding that a treaty of peace is necessary to establish a state of peace, I quote as follows:

Fiore: A war between two or more States can only be considered as legally ended by the conclusion of peace stipulated in a final treaty of peace.

Military occupation, although extended over a considerable period of time and rendered stable by the constitutional government, can not have the effect of causing the war to be considered as legally at an end, as the result of the tacit relinquishment of the territory occupied; but a formal treaty shall always be required, which shall recognize the new state of affairs, and thus war shall be declared at an end.

When under the provisions of constitutional law peace can only be concluded on condition that the treaty be ratified by the legislative bodies, the war must be considered at an end by the stipulation of the treaty of peace, but subject to the condition subsequent of ratification. The agreement must, however, be regarded as effective and can not be considered as broken unless the legislative assemblies have expressly refused to ratify the treaty. (Fiore, Pasquale, International Law Codified, secs. 1953, 1955, 1961.)

Lawrence: War between civilized States is almost invariably ended by a treaty of peace. It has sometimes happened that the belligerents have exhausted themselves and tacitly ceased from further operations, but there are no recent instances of such a termination to hostilities in a struggle of any consequence, except the withdrawal of the French troops from Mexico in 1867 at the instigation of the United States. Wars may come to an end through the destruction of one of the communities engaged in them, as Poland was destroyed by the third partition, or as the Southern Confederacy fell after four years of strenuous warfare. In such cases no treaty is possible because there is no body politic left for the victor to treat with. Great Britain, however, strained a point in 1902 because of the special circumstances of the Boer War and consented to negotiate with the leaders of the Boer commandoes still in the field against her, though the Governments in whose name they waged war had ceased to govern and no longer exercised any powers of sovereignty over definite territorial areas. But when each of the belligerents preserves its political identity after the war a treaty is drawn up embodying the conditions of peace. (Lawrence, T. J., Principles of International Law, sec. 217.)

Bluntschli: War is terminated by the conclusion of peace, i. e., by a treaty between the belligerent States fixing the conditions and regulations of the renewed state of peace. (Bluntschli, Dr. J. C., Das Moderne Völkerrecht, sec. 703.)

Pomeroy: * * * practice has become universal, and as such incorporated into the positive law of nations, that all treaties should be written and executed with great formality. Whenever an agreement in the nature of a compact is verbal it must be reduced to writing as soon as possible.

The consent must be positive and certain, but it may have this quality of positiveness, and be either express or tacit or implied. A tacit or implied consent would generally have place in the case of a ratification. But mere silence would never amount to an implied consent; there must be some positive act indicating the assenting intention of the party. (Pomeroy, J. N., International Law, sec. 272.)

Oppenheim: Many publicists correctly call a treaty of peace the normal mode of terminating war. On the one hand, simple cessation of hostilities is certainly an irregular mode. (Oppenheim, L., International Law, vol. 2, sec. 266.) Subjugation, on the other hand, is in most cases either not within the scope of the intention of the victor or not realizable. And it is quite reasonable that a treaty of peace should be the normal end of war. (Oppenheim, International Law, vol. 2, sec. 266.)

Rivier, A.: Hostilities may cease and a de facto state of peace may be established without a special treaty of peace. This, however, is a rare occurrence and may be regarded as an anomaly.

Sooner or later a treaty of peace will have to take the place of the de facto state of peace. (Rivier, A., Lehrbuch des Völkerrechts, sec. 69.)

AUTHORITIES HOLDING THAT A TREATY OF PEACE IS NOT ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY TO ESTABLISH A STATE OF PEACE.

Phillimore: There appear to be three ways by which war may be concluded and peace restored:

1. By a de facto cessation of hostilities on the part of both belligerents and a renewal de facto of the relation of peace.
2. By the unconditional submission of one belligerent to another.
3. By the conclusion of a formal treaty of peace between the belligerents.

A formal declaration on the part of the belligerents that war has ceased, however usual and desirable, can not be said to be absolutely necessary for the restoration of peace. War may silently cease and peace be silently renewed. So ended the war between Sweden and Poland in the year 1716, namely, by a reciprocal intermission of hostilities; it was not until after the lapse of 10 years that peace was formally and de jure recognized as subsisting between the two Kingdoms.

In such a state of things the presumption of law would be that both parties had agreed that the status quo ante bellum should be revived. Yet, in the absence of any formal declaration, it would not be concluded that the claims which had given occasion to the war, or which had grown out of the war, were abandoned, but they must be considered as in abeyance. In fact, it is as difficult to predicate the consequences, legal and practical, of such a state of things as it would be to predicate the consequences of a treaty of peace which contained no clause of amnesty. (Phillimore, Sir. Robert, International Law, pt. 12, ch. 1, pars. 510, 511.)

Oppenheim: Be that as it may, a war may be terminated in three different ways. Belligerents may, first, abstain from further acts of war and glide into peaceful relations without expressly making peace through a special treaty. Or, secondly, belligerents may formally establish the condition of peace through a special treaty of peace. Or, thirdly, a belligerent may end the war through subjugation of his adversary.

The regular modes of termination of war are treaties of peace or subjugation, but cases have occurred in which simple cessation of all acts of war on the part of both belligerents has actually and informally brought the war to an end. Thus ended in 1716 the war between Sweden and Poland, 1720 the war between Spain and France, in 1801 the war between Russia and Persia, in 1876 the war between France and Mexico. And it may also be mentioned that, whereas the war between Prussia and several German States in 1866 came to an end through subjugation of some States and through treaties of peace with others, Prussia has never concluded a treaty of peace with the Principality of Lichtenstein, which was also a party to the war. Although such a termination of war through simple cessation of hostilities is for many reasons inconvenient, and is therefore, as a rule, avoided, it may nevertheless in the future as in the past occasionally occur. (Oppenheim, L., International Law, secs. 261, 262.)

Heffter: It is not necessary that the termination of a state of war shall be formally declared by the belligerent parties, although it is advisable and customary. Hostilities may be silently ended. After friendly relations have thus been reestablished neither party may claim privileges which may accrue from a continued state of war. (Heffter, A. W., Das Europäische Völkerrecht der Gegenwart, sec. 177.)

Seward: It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances.

The proceedings of Spain and Chile which have been referred to, although conclusive, require an explanation on the part of either of those powers which shall insist that the condition of war still exists. Peru, especially with Spain, has an absolute right to decline the good offices or mediation of the United States for peace as either has to accept the same. The refusal of either would be inconclusive as an evidence of determination to resume or continue the war. It is the interest of the United States, and of all nations, that the return of peace, however it may be brought about, shall be accepted whenever it has become clearly established. Whenever the United States shall find itself obliged to decide the question whether the war still exists between Spain and Peru, or whether that war has come to an end, it will make that decision only after having carefully examined all the pertinent facts which shall be within its reach, and after having given due consideration to such representations as shall have been made by the several parties interested. (Seward, W., Secretary of State, to Mr. Goñi, Spanish minister, July 9, 1868, U. S. Diplomatic Correspondence, 1868, II, 32, 34.)

Vattel: We shall therefore content ourselves with observing that in case of a pressing necessity, such as is produced by the events of an unfortunate war, the alienations (of a part of a State) made by the prince in order to save the remainder of the State are considered as approved and ratified by the mere silence of the nation, when she has not, in the form of her government, retained some easy and ordinary method of giving her express consent, and has lodged an absolute power in the prince's hands. (Vattel, E. de, Law of Nations, Book IV, ch. 2, sec. 11.)

Hall: War is terminated by the conclusion of a treaty of peace, by simple cessation of hostilities, or by the conquest of one, or of part of one, of the belligerent States by the other. (Hall, W. E., A Treatise on International Law, III, ch. 9.)

EFFECT OF TERMINATION OF WAR THROUGH SIMPLE CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES.

Oppenheim: Since in the case of termination of war through simple cessation of hostilities no treaty of peace embodies the conditions of peace between the former belligerents, the question arises whether the status which existed between the parties before the outbreak of war, the status quo ante bellum, should be revived, or the status which exists between the parties at the time when they simply ceased hostilities, the status quo post bellum (the uti possidetis), can be upheld. The majority of publicists correctly maintain that the status which exists at the time of cessation of hostilities becomes silently recognized through such cessation, and is, therefore, the basis of the future relations of the parties. This question is of the greatest importance regarding enemy territory militarily occupied by a belligerent at the time hostilities cease. According to the correct opinion, such territory can be annexed by the occupier; the adversary, through the cessation of hostilities, having dropped all rights he possessed over such territory. On the other hand, this termination of war through cessation of hostilities contains no decision regarding such claims of the parties as have not been settled by the actual position of affairs at the termination of hostilities, and it remains for the parties to settle them by special agreement or to let them stand over. (Oppenheim, L., International Law, sec. 263.)

EFFECT OF REJECTION OF RATIFICATION OF PEACE TREATY.

Fiore: As soon as the decision not to ratify the treaty has been finally reached, the law of war shall once more be in full force and hostile acts may again be undertaken without reservation or condition. (Fiore, Pasquale, International Law Codified, sec. 1962.)

Westlake: The contracting authorities, of whom only one can, in general, be present at the court where the treaty is signed, reserve to themselves the power to conclude finally. The ratification may be refused by any party; and although this would be offensive if done without grave reason, it is impossible to limit the right of doing it, and there are sufficient examples of its being done even by foreign ministers who all along had control over the negotiations. Where the contracting authority is shared by a body having no such control, as the Senate of the United States, refusal of ratification may result from the exercise of independent judgment, and is very natural. Such a body will occasionally attempt to qualify its ratification by a modification of the terms of the treaty, but such a proceeding is nothing more than the proposal of a new treaty, which may or may not be accepted. (Westlake, J., International Law, Pt. I, ch. 12.)

INSTANCES WHERE RATIFICATION OF TREATIES WAS REFUSED.

Twiss: It may happen after a treaty has been signed by the plenipotentiary of a nation that grave circumstances occur under which the provisions of the treaty may be likely to have a prejudicial effect upon the interests of that nation which were not known at the time of signature. Under such circumstances the sovereign power of a nation is by usage justified in declining to ratify the treaty. Thus, the King of the Netherlands refused in 1841 to ratify a treaty for the incorporation of Luxemburg into the Customs Union of the Germanic States on the ground of the injurious effects which it was likely to exercise upon the commercial interests of his subjects, which had been brought to his knowledge subsequently to the signature of the treaty. So the King of the French declined in 1841 to ratify the quadruple treaty for the suppression of the slave trade on account of the objections raised against it in the French Chambers. So Great Britain declined in 1859 to ratify a treaty which her minister plenipotentiary had concluded with Nicaragua, and Nicaragua in the same year declined to ratify her convention with Great Britain for the settlement of the Greytown and Mosquito question. If, however, there should be an express provision that the preliminary engagements shall take effect immediately without waiting for the exchange of ratifications, such a treaty will be an exception to the rule. (Twiss, T., the Law of Nations, sec. 233.)

It is, therefore, evident and beyond all question that the proponents of this resolution and its supporters have arrayed themselves against all constituted authority and against the recognized authorities on international law. It can not be presumed that all the gentlemen on the other side in this House are ignorant of international law, or that they are unaware of the fact that their position can not be legally and constitutionally maintained. The proposition, therefore, narrows itself down to the justified presumption that the Republican leaders in Congress have deliberately launched a political scheme, hazarding the rights of the Republic and in defiance of the Constitution, in order to mislead the public, embarrass the administration, and with the hope that they may gain political ascendancy in the fall elections.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING].

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the pending resolution. I am not a lawyer and have no right to assume or pretend to be able to pass upon the question from a lawyer's point of view. I have during the course of this debate, however, listened to at least two great addresses directed to the constitutionality of this proposed resolution. Both the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] have presented arguments which no Member of the majority in favor of this resolution has undertaken seriously to combat or answer.

Every proponent of this resolution has addressed himself to the question of expediency. They declare, in effect, that the President and the Senate have failed to bring about peace in a constitutional way. These agencies, clearly under the mandate of the Constitution charged with the duty of making a treaty, having done wrong, it is now proposed that we do a thing confessedly indefensible and wrong to correct the evil.

A man does not need to be a lawyer, either constitutional or otherwise, to have some regard for his oath of office as a Member of this great body. A careful reading of the debate on the treaty-making and war-making power under the Constitution clearly reveals the fact that the framers of that great instrument did not intend that the House should participate in the framing of a treaty or concluding peace with a foreign power. To the contrary, by unanimous vote, these men denied the right of the House to have any part in the business of making peace.

At a time of uncertainty like this, when the passions of men lead them to denounce our institutions and our laws, it seems a shame that a great party should lend itself to a deliberate violation of the supreme law simply to obtain what they hope to be a political advantage.

Much as I desire the resumption of normal prewar conditions, I refuse to barter for them by tearing down the very foundations of liberty and free government. At a time when we should be holding up the principles of free constitutional government, the Republicans of this House are by this resolution exchanging those principles for a political mess of pottage.

The excuse for all this is a pretended desire to escape from the essential restrictions and oppressive prohibitions of necessary war-time legislation. Section 2 of this resolution repeals in one sentence 65 such laws. The hypocrisy and insincerity of such proceeding is clearly apparent upon a simple statement of our legislative history for the past year. The Republican Party has been in complete control of both branches of Congress during that time, and Congress has been continuously in session. Every day for a full year this House has been organized and competent to consider and repeal any one or all of these laws. No such action has ever been presented for consideration of this body. Not only so, but no committee has yet during all that time ever considered the repeal of these laws, much less reporting such legislation for action of the House. Furthermore, no member of the majority has yet been able to point to any measure he has proposed looking to the repeal of these necessary war-time laws. Perhaps one exception to this general statement should be made, namely, the railroad-control act, which terminated Government operation of railroads. But this was not done until the President had fixed the date for the return of the roads. Later, on account of the delay of this House in providing the necessary laws, the President was forced to extend the time, giving the House an additional 60 days in which to act.

This failure of the majority to consider the repeal of any of these war-time laws is all the more remarkable because it has been notorious that we have literally spent months here with nothing important to do. Those who remained here during all the dreary months of last summer remember well that the result of our work then was accurately described as "chicken-feed legislation" by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who manifested his own distaste and disgust with the proceedings by going home for the summer and recommending that his colleagues do the same thing.

The Republicans of this House, as a basis for this meddling with our treaty-making power, seize eagerly upon the noble utterance of the President on November 11, 1918, wherein he stated: "The war thus comes to an end." Their hypocrisy in basing the whole structure of this resolution upon a rhetorical statement that the fighting had stopped is apparent when it is known of all men that the Supreme Court has held that war-time laws could only be terminated by their repeal, or the signing of a treaty of peace, and the proclamation of that peace by the President.

For months you have shown a studied disregard of the plain demand of the President in regard to the repeal of war laws in a proper and orderly manner.

In his message to this House on October 27 the President said:

> I object to and can not approve that part of this legislation with reference to war-time prohibition. It has to do with the enforcement of an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war, and whose objects have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy, and whose repeal I have already sought at the hands of Congress. Where the purposes of particular legislation arising out of war emergency have been satisfied, sound public policy makes clear the reason and necessity for repeal.

Here is an express demand for the repeal of one war-time law and a general statement recommending the repeal of the others. The very men to-day who denounce these war laws voted that day to keep the particular one then under discussion in force in spite of the veto of the President, and they have refused ever since to seek the repeal of any others.

Moreover, the men who to-day denounce the continuance of war-time laws and demand their repeal were only 30 days ago denouncing the President because he did not prosecute so-called coal profiteers and sugar profiteers under the terms of these same laws. As this debate proceeds to-day the forces of labor are ominously threatening a great strike on the railroads of this country, and it will not be a week before some Republican rises in his place here and denounces the President for failure to act under these same restrictive measures.

What is the effect of this resolution? You say to Germany by this abortion of justice, "Shake hands. War is not such a bad thing after all. We forgive you for sinking our ships and murdering our women and children upon the high seas. We approve of your inhuman slaughter of our men from Chateau-Thierry, through San Mihiel and the Argonne Forest, to the armistice at Sedan. We are now willing to make a separate peace with you, disregarding all claims of reparations and without your promise of any reform. We cheerfully abandon Belgium without your promise of reparation or reconstruction or indemnities. We leave France without guaranties and turn our back upon England and Italy. We invite you to rape and destroy the new government set up in central and southern Europe. And after you have accepted our resolution, we will come to you, hat in hand, and ask you to form a more extended treaty of peace." No more contemptible attitude of servility was ever assumed by any nation since history began than is contemplated by the House to-day.

Thank God at last for the obstinacy and self-righteousness of the Senate of the United States. Having sought to usurp the power of the Executive in this treaty making business, they are unlikely to abdicate to this House in a matter over which they have undoubted concurrent jurisdiction.

The majority in this House have by their action to-day and by their words throughout this debate been given a rare opportunity to criticize the President and denounce his conduct of our foreign relations. During this debate men on that side of the aisle have broken into delighted applause when the sickness of the President was mentioned. It is probable that no public man in the history of our Government was ever so hated by those who would tear him down from the high place he has won in the affections of his countrymen and the statesmanship of the world. He is passing to-day through the bitter experience of every lofty spirit which has swayed the destiny of the world in times that are past. As I contemplate his place in history and see about me the weaknesses and failings of those to-day who hate his success, I am reminded of the force and justice of what was said 2,000 years ago:

> Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

[Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, no one who witnessed celebrations of the news of the signing of the armistice can ever forget the unbounded happiness of the mothers and fathers of America. Hostilities had come to an end. The gallant soldiers of the Republic had suddenly brought the world's greatest war to a close and would soon return to the arms of their loved ones at home. The American people love peace and hate war, and it was their hope that the end had come to all wars. The terms of the armistice were such as to preclude the enemy from renewing hostilities. Everyone knew that the war was at an end so far as further fighting was concerned.

It became necessary to draft the treaty of peace, and the foremost men of the allied nations met at Versailles, and among the group was the President of the United States. Before the treaty was completed or its terms known the enemies of the President commenced a hue and cry in this country about his going to Europe to negotiate the treaty and tried to cause him every embarrassment and humiliation possible while his great task was the hardest.

Under the Constitution it was the duty of the President to negotiate the terms of the treaty, but it could not become effective and binding until it had the approval of two-thirds of the Senate present consenting thereto. Article II, section 2, reads:

He—

shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

It was the purpose of the makers of the Constitution to vest the power to fix the terms of peace in the President and the Senate. The power to declare war is placed in both branches of Congress, but the moment war is declared the President is granted supreme power to conduct the war. The authority to conduct the war having been once vested in the President, the Congress can not divest him of that power by an attempt to declare peace.

No one will contend that while the war is in progress the Congress could pass a resolution to end the war. If the resolution could not be passed by Congress under such circumstances then under what claim of authority do the proponents of this resolution act?

It is certainly not based upon the construction placed upon the Constitution by its makers, for we read from Madison's Journal the following excerpts:

To make war.

Mr. Pinckney opposed the vesting this power in the legislature. Its proceedings were too slow. It would meet but once a year. The House of Representatives would be too numerous for such deliberations. The Senate would be the best depositary, being more acquainted with foreign affairs, and most capable of proper resolutions. If the States are equally represented in Senate, so as to give no advantage to large States, the power will notwithstanding be safe, as the small have their all at stake in such cases as well as the large States. It would be singular for one authority to make war and another peace.

Mr. Butler: The objections against the legislature lie in a great degree against the Senate. He was for vesting the power in the President, who will have all the requisite qualities and will not make war but when the Nation will support it.

Mr. Madison and Mr. Gerry moved to insert "declare," striking out "make" war, leaving to the Executive the power to repel sudden attacks.

Mr. Sherman thought it stood very well. The Executive should be able to repel and not to commence war. "Make" better than "declare," the latter narrowing the power too much.

Mr. Gerry never expected to hear in a Republic a motion to empower the Executive alone to declare war.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. There is a material difference between the cases of making war and making peace. It should be more easy to get out of war than into it. War also is a simple and overt declaration; peace attended with intricate and secret negotiations.

Mr. Mason was against giving the power of war to the Executive, because not [safely] to be trusted with it, or to the Senate, because not so constructed as to be entitled to it. He was for clogging rather than facilitating war, but for facilitating peace. He preferred "declare" to "make."

On the motion to insert "declare" in place of "make" [it was agreed to].

Mr. Butler moved to give the legislature power of peace, as they were to have that of war.

Mr. Gerry 2ds. him. 8 Senators may possibly exercise the power if vested in that body, and 14, if all should be present, and may consequently give up part of the U. States. The Senate are more liable to be corrupted by an enemy than the whole legislature.

On motion for adding "and peace" after "war."

Adjourned.

The fourth section, to wit, "The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall have power to make treaties," etc., was then taken up.

Mr. Wilson moved to add after the word "Senate" the words "and House of Representatives." As treaties, he said, are to have the operation of laws, they ought to have the sanction of laws also. The circumstance of secrecy in the business of treaties formed the only objection; but this, he thought, so far as it was inconsistent with obtaining the legislative sanction, was outweighed by the necessity of the latter.

Mr. Sherman thought the only question that could be made was whether the power could be safely trusted to the Senate. He thought it could, and that the necessity of secrecy in the case of treaties forbade a reference of them to the whole legislature.

Mr. Fitzsimmons seconded the motion of Mr. Wilson; and, on the question—ayes 1, noes 10.

It is seen from this record of the proceedings of the convention that it is settled that Congress does not possess the power to make peace.

The safety of the Republic lies in the balance of power between the three coordinate branches of the Government, and it is the duty of each branch to prevent as far as possible any encroachment upon its jurisdiction by any other branch. The President has no right to encroach upon Congress, and neither has Congress any right to invade his duties. Because he has not conducted the making of the treaty in accordance with the views of the Republican leaders of the House is no excuse for them to try to make the treaty after their own fashion. There being no warrant of authority in the Constitution by which the House of Representatives has any power to make a treaty of peace, the lawyers on the majority side attempt to justify the passage of the resolution on the ground that the resolution is not a treaty.

A treaty is nothing more than a contract between independent nations. The resolution attempts to make a contract with the German Government relating to reciprocal trade between the nationals of the two countries. The German Government must give its assent to the terms of the resolution within 45 days or a financial and trade boycott on the part of the United States follows:

Sections 3 and 5 of the resolution undertake to fix the rights of the respective Governments and their nationals by the terms of the treaty of Versailles. These sections provide as follows:

SEC. 3. That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with the German Government and its nationals, and for this purpose it is hereby provided that unless within 45 days from the date when this resolution becomes effective the German Government shall duly notify the President of the United States that it has declared a termination of the war with the United States and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles, the President of the United States shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to proclaim the fact that the German Government has not given the notification hereinbefore mentioned, and thereupon and until the President shall have proclaimed the receipt of such notification commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany and the making of loans or credits and the furnishing of financial assistance or supplies to the German Government or the inhabitants of Germany, directly or indirectly, by the Government or the inhabitants of the United States shall, except with the license of the President, be prohibited.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as a waiver by the United States of any rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which the United States has become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States by reason of its participation in the war, or otherwise, and all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States are hereby ratified, confirmed, and maintained.

These sections disclose beyond a doubt that the resolution is an attempt to make terms of peace and thereby beyond the power of the House of Representatives. It is worthy of notice that although the treaty negotiated by the President is so obnoxious at times to the proponents of this resolution, yet when it will serve the political convenience of the majority party they invoke its terms in the resolution.

Aside from the question of the power of the House of Representatives under the Constitution to pass such a resolution, is it the right thing to do under all the circumstances? If the passage of the resolution would hasten the settlement of the turmoils of the world and bring quietude to the people of the United States, its enactment might be justified, notwithstanding the doubtful authority of the House to act. But the passage of this resolution means that we abandon the allied nations of the world and make a separate peace with Germany; that we are willing to take advantage of all the benefits of the treaty of Versailles without assuming any of the obligations; that we are willing to sacrifice the good opinion of the world for the right to trade with our recent enemy.

By the adoption of this resolution we indicate that we are willing to abandon the hope to settle disputes between nations by arbitration, the disarmament of the world, and the abolition of secret treaties. Our gallant soldiers brought this World War to an end, and it is our duty to see some means is provided to end all wars.

This resolution will only add to the confusion now existing caused by the failure of ratification of the treaty.

The failure of the treaty-making powers to conclude the treaty of peace does not justify the House of Representatives in passing an unauthorized resolution. By so doing is adding hope to the "bitter enders" and joy to those who make munitions of war. By such a course we say to the world that we prefer to stand with Germany outside of a League of Nations than to stand with the rest of the world in a League of Nations.

The resolution provides for the repeal of the war-time acts. Of course, this Congress has the power to repeal the emergency legislation enacted during the war. This is a duty that this Congress should have entered upon long ago in a systematic way. I favor the repeal of much of the war-time legislation, and but for the attempt by this resolution to make a treaty I should lend my vote and support to the same, although it is entirely too general in its scope.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the sacrifices our people have made in hardships and heartaches, and in lives and broken bodies, to bring this war to a speedy termination, I for one am unwilling to offer to the memory of our heroic dead this resolution as the finale in American statesmanship in treaty making. I am unwilling to offer it to the broken-hearted relatives as the only hope to prevent future wars.

I am for peace and for a permanent peace in the world. I oppose the maintaining of great war machines and compulsory military service or training in time of peace, but this resolution makes no provision for the reduction of armaments of the nations nor for the regulation among the nations of compulsory military service in times of peace.

The voice of those who have merchandise to sell has been heard and this resolution must be adopted at once.

The adoption of the resolution is an attempt to trade the hopes of the Nation for the right to bargain and sell to the enemy.

In my desire for peace I am unwilling to act the part of Esau and trade the birthright of the Nation for a mess of pottage. I cast my vote against the resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this resolution because it violates the Constitution of my country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am opposed to it because it would be a failure in imposing ample and sufficient terms on the German Government, and I am opposed to it because I feel that we should not, by attempting a separate peace, desert those who were associated with us in this war. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No resolution of this character was ever before in our history presented to Congress for consideration. It is a mockery to the passionate demand for peace that is world wide. It is a deceptive response to the demand of the American people for a legal status of peace. All the nations associated with us have already signed the treaty of Versailles and, under peace conditions, are now attempting to reestablish themselves in all activities of their lives. The United States alone of the countries who participated in the war has refused and rejected this treaty. Even nations who were neutral during the great conflict have come in and made themselves parties to the treaty by accepting membership in the League of Nations provided in it. It is hard to escape the conclusion that partisan politics of the most unrighteous sort has prevented us from accepting this treaty, and from thereby establishing and creating in the method provided by our organic law a legal status of peace for the guidance and benefit of our citizens.

A method is provided by our Constitution for the purpose of negotiating treaties and bringing to an end conflicts with foreign nations. In clear and distinct language our Constitution confers upon the President of the United States the duty of negotiating such treaties, which become effective upon the assent and with the advice of two-thirds of the Senate. But the measure now under consideration is a clear and distinct violation of the powers conferred upon the House of Representatives. This is purely a legislative body, created with well-defined limitations of power, and now undertakes to declare the war at an end and to negotiate terms of peace with the German Government.

If the Republican leadership had consulted the Constitution of their country instead of their hatred for Woodrow Wilson, this resolution would not have been brought forward. It is conceived in partisan venom toward the great Chief Executive of this Nation. He endeavored to prevent war as long as it was possible to do so, but when no longer possible he led this Nation into the war with vigor, and under his matchless guidance the armies of the German Empire were thrown back across the Rhine, Belgium and France were relieved from the foot of the invader, militarism was destroyed, and civilization once again set upon its forward march. This is an attempt by his political opponents to embarrass him in the management of foreign affairs and to destroy his prestige at home and abroad. I for one shall not be a party to such unholy purpose.

The Government of the United States was created, formed, and given life by the Constitution. This Constitution, a compact for the purpose of forming a more perfect Union, was entered into by the thirteen original sovereign States. In forming the Union the Constitution has provided three separate, independent, coordinate departments—the executive, the judicial, and the legislative. The Constitution itself has marked the lines of power for each of these.

An examination of this great instrument of government will disclose the powers which are conferred upon the Congress. They are set out in section 8 of Article I of the Constitution. Clause 2 of this section provides that Congress shall have power "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water." Congress is further empowered to raise and support armies and to provide and maintain a navy. But nowhere in the Constitution is it provided that Congress by a joint resolution, as a legislative body, may prescribe the terms of settlement of disputes with foreign countries and enter into agreements for ending hostilities.

On the contrary, this power is particularly and expressly conferred by the Constitution, in Article II, upon the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, providing two-thirds of the Senators present shall concur.

It is easy to perceive the reasons why the Constitution placed in the House and Senate the power to declare war. The declaration of war is a single act. We can declare war against another nation whether the latter shall wish war or shall not wish war. It involves the raising of armies and vast expenditures of money. Before this status shall be created it was the purpose of the framers of our Constitution that there should be action by Congress, including the House of Representatives. The declaration of war involves merely our attitude as to belligerency toward a foreign power, and they wisely left this to the Congress.

But the making of a peace—of a permanent peace—involves the consent and agreement of the nation with whom we are at war. It is necessarily the subject of negotiation. If the causes of a war are to be eliminated an agreement is necessary. We went to war with Germany for certain definite reasons. A treaty of peace is necessary that Germany may no longer assert the right to do the things which involved us in the war. Unless we shall insist upon this, while we may have destroyed her armies and rendered her unable to fight for the moment, as between us and her the war will become a draw. The same causes of war, the same arbitrary action, may be continued by Germany which led us into the war. A treaty of peace must be made, and it must be made in the constitutional method.

A treaty is a compact between sovereign powers. Hamilton has pointed out in the Federalist, in discussing the Constitution and the treaty-making power conferred therein, that the making of a treaty is in a sense neither within the ordinary duties of the legislative branch of the Government nor of the Executive branch. It is not of the nature of an ordinary law which may be enacted. It is a contract between two sovereignties and becomes effective through the power of good faith between nations. An agreement of this nature can not successfully be made by a mere legislative body. It requires negotiations and adjustments which can only be made by a contract, and this contract, it is specifically provided, shall be negotiated by the President and become effective when consented to by the Senate, upon a vote of two-thirds of its Members. In fact, the journal of the general convention which formulated the Constitution shows that a motion was made by one of its members to confer upon Congress, in addition, the power "to make peace," and this motion was defeated by unanimous vote.

In Story on the Constitution, section 1173, we find:

> In the convention, in the first draft of the Constitution the power was given merely "to make war." It was subsequently, and not without some struggle, altered to its present form. It was proposed to add the power "to make peace," but this was unanimously rejected, upon the plain ground that it more properly belonged to the treaty-making power. The experience of Congress under the confederation of the difficulties attendant upon vesting the treaty-making power in a large legislative body was too deeply felt to justify the hazard of another experiment.

Washington was a member of the general convention and presided over its deliberations. After he became President, because of disputes, especially involving our frontier and our commercial rights, it became necessary to negotiate a further treaty with England. He selected John Jay, at that time Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, to negotiate a treaty. This treaty, known as the Jay treaty, after much acrimonious and bitter debate, was finally ratified, but it aroused the passions of the people. Those who disliked Washington and opposed the treaty brought forward the now familiar argument against the British Empire and alleged that the Jay treaty conceded rights to England which should not have been conceded. Even after it was passed, when it became necessary to carry it into effect, the debate was continued in the House of Representatives. By resolution, solemnly adopted, the House called upon Washington as President to lay before it all instructions which he had given Jay and all papers relating to the treaty. On March 7, 1796, he replied to this resolution of the House, declining to transmit the papers desired and discussed the treaty-making power under the Constitution. In his letter to the House he says:

> The course which the debate has taken on the resolution of the House leads to some observations on the mode of making treaties under the Constitution of the United States.
> Having been a member of the general convention, and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment my conduct has exemplified that opinion—that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward became the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations, and in all the treaties made with them we have declared and they have believed that, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the Constitution every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced, and until the present time not a doubt of suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced, for till now, without controverting the obligations of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect.

From that time until this the correctness of these views of the first President has not been questioned, and no other House of Representatives, except this, has since embarked upon such an attempted violation of our fundamental law.

I wish also to call the attention of the House to the fact that Washington expressed these views with the full concurrence of his Cabinet. He outlines the nature of foreign negotiations, which would clearly indicate how impractical it is for this House to undertake to settle our relations with Germany in the method now proposed. He further said:

The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy; and even when brought to a conclusion, a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concessions which may have been proposed or contemplated would be extremely impolitic, for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations or produce immediate inconveniences, perhaps danger and mischief, in relation to other powers. The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the principle on which that body was formed confining it to a small number of members. To admit, then, a right in the House of Representatives to demand and to have, as a matter of course, all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power would be to establish dangerous precedent.

Thus, with a calm dignity but with certainty and courage, Washington declined to comply with the resolution of the House upon the ground that the treaty-making power was not included in its functions. Again I quote from this letter and recommend it to the consideration of the Republican leadership, which now, after more than 100 years, would again undertake, in a paroxysm of political hate, to violate the Constitution which they have so clamorously declared they were desirous of maintaining:

If other proofs than these and the plain letter of the Constitution itself be necessary to ascertain the point under consideration, they may be found in the journals of the general convention, which I have deposited in the office of the Department of State. In those journals it will appear that a proposition was made "that no treaty should be binding on the United States which was not ratified by law," and that the proposition was explicitly rejected.

As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of the treaty, as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provision, and on these the papers called for can throw no light, and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different departments should be preserved, a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office, under all circumstances of this case, forbids a compliance with your request.

Let us suppose that President Wilson had declined a request of this House as Washington did. To what extent of denunciation would the authors of this resolution have proceeded? The clamorous cry would have gone forth that the President was drawing to himself the powers of an autocrat and was refusing to give information to the Congress. They would have been forgetful of the fact that Congress is but one of the three separate, independent, and coordinate branches of our Government. What right has Congress to take to itself powers which are not given it by the Constitution? And shall we now yield to this partisan attempt to destroy the distribution and balance of powers conferred by the Constitution upon the several departments?

But Washington himself did not escape the tongue of calumny. I was about to say that in history there was no parallel with the savage and frenzied attacks made upon our present Chief Executive. But such parallel does exist in the Jay treaty itself. I read to you from Washington and His Colleagues, written by Henry Jones Ford:

During the agitation over the Jay treaty the rage of party spirit turned full against Washington himself. He was blackguarded and abused in every possible way. He was accused of having embezzled public funds while President. He was nicknamed "the Stepfather of his Country." The imputation on his honor stung so keenly that he declared "he would rather be in his grave than in the Presidency," and in private correspondence he complained that he had been assailed "in terms so exaggerated and indecent as could scarcely be applied to a Nero, a notorious defaulter, or even to a common pickpocket."

But they who made the attacks are now forgotten. You will have to search the annals of Congress to learn their names. Washington still stands out in grand and glorious dignity as the founder of our Republic, and I predict that in the years that are to come those who similarly attack Woodrow Wilson will be forgotten and the record of these acrimonious denunciations of him will be read with surprise and condemnation, while his name shall be a household word throughout the world.

Even Congress itself has uniformly recognized that the war would come to end by treaty negotiated by the President and ratified by the Senate. In all of the war-time legislation intended to end with the war we find recognition of this fact.

For instance, in the emergency shipping act of March 15, 1917, it is provided "that all authority under the act shall cease six months after a treaty of peace is proclaimed by this Government and the German Empire."

The railroad-control act was to end with "the proclamation of the exchange of the ratification of a treaty." So with the food-control act of August 10, 1914; the soldiers and sailors' civil rights bill of March 8, 1918; the trading-with-the-enemy act of October 6, 1917. This act provides "that the words 'end of war' as used herein shall be deemed to mean the date of proclamation of an exchange of the ratification of the treaty of peace."

It was not even suggested that the war might otherwise end by any action that this House could take.

In attempting to sustain their position the majority report quotes Oppenheim on International Law, as follows:

War may be terminated in three different ways: Belligerents may (1) abstain from further acts of war and glide into peaceful relations without expressly making peace through a special treaty, or (2) belligerents may formally establish the condition of peace through a special treaty, or (3) a belligerent may end the war by subjugation of his adversary.

Certainly there is nothing in this authority that even intimates that Congress has the power by mere declaration of this sort to end this war. If it has ended by a cessation of hostilities, it has so ended and the declaration of Congress adds nothing to the situation, even if it had power to act. But all writers on international law state that a treaty is necessary and that "combatant States have seldom resorted to this method of withdrawing from war without arriving at some definite and intelligible decision."

Unless, therefore, Germany is not to be brought to account to us and the world, a treaty is necessary, and this resolution would be but a mere withdrawal from the war with such an accounting unmade.

If this is an attempt to negotiate terms of settlement with Germany, it is essentially a treaty. Let us therefore examine the terms of the resolution.

The preamble indicates the remarkable state of mind and wonderful conception of those who drafted it. With an unparalleled hypocrisy, it undertakes to base the resolution upon the statement that the President himself had advised the Congress that the war with the Imperial German Empire had ended. So he did. In announcing to the Congress in December, 1918, that an armistice had been signed and that hostilities had ceased he stated, "Thus the war comes to an end." This was a pæan of victory, announcing that actual hostilities had ceased. Germany had laid down her arms; the war in a sense had ended, gloriously and triumphantly; but that the relations between the German Government and the world were intended to be settled by this simple declaration of the triumph of our armies no one believes. For many months thereafter the President himself labored to adjust the terms of peace. After months of such labor, heartbreaking and weary, the treaty of Versailles was signed. It was nothing short of an adjustment of the affairs of an entire world. No greater task was ever undertaken by men. Under these labors the very strength of the President succumbed. He discharged his full constitutional duty. He undertook to do the things that our organic law placed upon the Chief Executive. That treaty, as the Constitution provides, was submitted by him to the Senate for ratification. It was rejected by the Senate and returned to the President. There can be no treaty until the method provided by the Constitution is followed.

The language used in the preamble has been given an interpretation by the Supreme Court itself. It was used as an argument in the case of Hamilton against Kentucky Distilleries, decided by the Supreme Court in October, 1919, for the purpose of having that court declare void the war-time prohibition act, but Justice Brandeis held that it was a mere popular expression to indicate the ending of hostilities and that the war was not ended until it was so declared by constitutional method.

Section 3 of the resolution is purely an attempt at treaty making. It undertakes to impose terms upon the German Government. Realizing the awkward and absurd position in which our Government will be without a formal treaty of peace, this section undertakes to provide that if the German Government shall not, within 45 days from the date of the ratification of this resolution, also declare a termination of the war and waive and renounce on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, right, demand, or benefit against the United States or its nationals, they would not have the right to assent under the treaty of Versailles, and the President shall proclaim the fact that Germany has not so done. It shall then become unlawful for American citizens to trade with the German Empire.

Thus the rejected treaty—the treaty which the Senate has returned to the President and to which it has refused its consent and advice—is undertaken to be written, in part at least, into this resolution. This proposal to Germany involves an agreement between the two sovereigns. An agreement can only be made by treaty, and under the Constitution it must be made by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. This is an attempt by Congress to negotiate. Let us suppose that Germany should make a counter proposition and should propose that they would do certain things if this Government should surrender the property which it had seized or should in any way seek to modify the provisions of section 3 of this resolution. We would thus be led into the field of negotiation, which the framers of the Constitution themselves knew could not be carried on through this body and for that reason conferred upon the Executive, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The mere reading of this section will show the futility and the lack of power and the absurdity of such an attempt to end the war by such a method.

Section 5 likewise attempts to build up an agreement with Germany based upon the armistice which was signed on November 11, 1918. To whom is section 5 directed? This section provides—

> That nothing herein contained can be construed as a waiver by the United States of its rights, privileges, indemnities, reparation, or advantages to which the United States has become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or which were acquired by the United States or are in the possession of the United States by reason of its participation in the war or otherwise; and all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States are hereby ratified, confirmed, and maintained.

What possible meaning has this section? Can this House under power granted in the Constitution negotiate with Germany? Can it enact legislation that is binding upon the German Empire? Suppose Congress does provide that we shall not waive any rights or indemnities acquired by virtue of the armistice. Must not Germany agree to such terms before they can rise to the dignity of enforcement between two sovereigns?

And regardless of the assertions contained in section 5, if we are to terminate the war without a treaty, if we are to withdraw from the conflict by a mere declaration that hostilities have ended, under the rules of international law what shall prevent the United States from losing the indemnities, and reparations, and advantages which it may have acquired or taken into possession during the conflict? Certainly the mere act of the House can not arrange an international status nor affect the rights of individuals of other countries. The armistice is a mere agreement for the cessation of actual hostilities, and only under a treaty based thereon could war be ended between the contending nations, if its terms are to be imposed. If, therefore, by this act of Congress we withdraw the right given us by the armistice to demand of Germany that she shall sign a treaty in conformity with its provisions, then, by international law, having foregone the right to make peace by treaty, the indemnities and reparations and advantages which we acquired must be lost to us.

But it is contended that a treaty not having been ratified, the power to declare the war at an end rests with Congress. One branch of Congress has failed to agree to the terms of the treaty and has rejected it, but this did not have the force of giving to this House the right to take over the duties of the Senate. Suppose Congress itself should fail to pass a necessary law, could the President claim the power to declare it by proclamation? Suppose the Supreme Court should refuse to perform some duty, could the Congress assume it? The argument is idle. Congress has often failed to pass laws that the people demanded, and the people have changed the membership of Congress, not the Constitution.

Section 1 of the resolution is a mere declaration by Congress that a state of war as declared by the joint resolution of Congress of April 6, 1917, is thereby declared at an end. This is in effect no more than an attempted repeal of the resolution of April 6, 1917. It is a foolish attempt on the part of Congress by its mere declaration, regardless of the powers with whom we have been at war, to create a legal status of peace between us. Such a declaration by Congress might be harmless enough, because of the lack of power to enact it, were it not for the fact that it might also involve us in a maze of difficulties. Since the resolution of April 6, 1917, many things have happened throughout the world. There has been a change in the possession of property. We have taken possession of millions of dollars of property belonging to private individuals and private corporations, subjects of the German Government. Damages have been incurred by our citizens and property belonging to them has no doubt been seized by the German Empire. When we declared war on Germany she had then been at war with the Allies since 1914. Our harbors were filled with her interned shipping. We took possession of it. We have it now. But it was not the property of the German Government; it was the property of her nationals.

By act of Congress we created an agency of Government known as the Custodian of Alien Property and we conferred upon this agency the power to take and dispose of the goods and property of every kind of our alien enemies. Under this power vast amounts of the property belonging to German nationals were seized and disposed of. Stocks in corporations, tangible property of every kind, trade-marks, and patent rights were all taken by our Government and sold by the Custodian of Alien Property. It is now claimed, I am informed, by the German nationals that the value of this property so confiscated amounts to several billions of dollars.

If, therefore, the great conflict with Germany is to end by a simple declaration of this character the title to this property would remain in the German nationals, corporate or individual, to which it originally belonged. It is therefore necessary that treaty agreements shall be made between our respective Governments to provide for the many and complex situations that have arisen. It is impossible that the American people would be content to let the war so end and to remit every German national, or every alien enemy of Austria, to their rights of the property so seized and to the prosecution of claims against our Government therefor.

At the same time, if such declaration is to end the war and Germany is not to be forced by this Republic to sign a treaty of peace that will protect American citizens, all their rights to damages of every kind against the Imperial German Government must likewise be remitted and foregone.

Never before has Congress, by a simple resolution, undertaken to settle the issues of any foreign war. History is to be reversed if this resolution is adopted.

When we had fought the Revolution, when Cornwallis had been defeated at Yorktown and the last vestige of British authority over the Colonies had been overthrown, the issues of the conflict were settled by a treaty of peace. Suppose we had been content with the mere declaration that hostilities had ceased. Suppose the leaders of those days had suggested to the American Colonies, who had shed so much blood for their independence, that all that was necessary was that Congress should adopt a resolution that the war was at an end. They had fought for a purpose. They had declared that the Colonies were and of right ought to be free and independent. They had declared that taxation without representation was intolerable. They had sought to establish themselves as free and independent sovereignties. It took more than a declaration of Congress to determine the rights for which they had so courageously fought and, though the British armies had been defeated and captured and Great Britain was no longer able to contend and her soldiers had laid down their arms, the American Colonies demanded, as of right they should have demanded, that the things for which they had fought should be embodied in the stipulations of a treaty that would guarantee their independence to themselves and their children forever. A protocol was signed at Paris on November 3, 1782. By it Great Britain acknowledged the independence of the United States, relinquished all claims, and specified the boundaries between the United States and Canada. Later a further and permanent treaty of peace embodying these terms and other terms imposed by the victorious Colonies was signed at Paris on September 3, 1783.

Again in 1812 we became involved in war with Great Britain. Again American armies were victorious. The war came to an end, but not by an absurd declaration by Congress that "war is hereby ended." This war was ended by the treaty of Ghent, which was signed on December 24, 1818. It declared peace between the two countries and provided for restoration of territory and established other rights for which we had contended.

In 1848 war again came to the American people. For the first time we had to lead American armies from American soil. The war with Mexico was in fact ended on September 14, 1847, when Gen. Scott marched a victorious army into the city of Mexico. In a sense the war had thus ended. Mexican armies had been defeated. The conflict was over just as surely as when Germany signed the armistice of November 11, 1918, but the matter did not thus end. The Army was not merely withdrawn to American soil and demobolized. We did not merely pass a declaration of Congress that the war had ended. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo concluded the war in 1848, about one year afterwards, and we are told by historians that this closed the Mexican War. Under its provisions territory which is now embraced in the States of Nevada, Utah, California, and parts of Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, and Wyoming was ceded by the Mexican Government to this Republic. It was done by treaty negotiated by the President, signed by him on the part of the American people and by the Mexican Government, and ratified by the Senate. If we had been content to rest upon the mere declaration by Congress that the war was over, these States would still have been Mexican territory. But, having followed the constitutional method of ending war, they were acquired by this Republic and seven new and brilliant stars took their places upon the blue field of the American banner. We ought to be thankful that we did not have, during those times, a leadership such as now dominates the American Congress.

The next foreign war was with Spain. The present Republican Party controlled both the executive and legislative branches. The war was fought to a successful conclusion. The American Squadron under Dewey boldly entered the harbor of Manila and destroyed the entire Spanish fleet and captured the naval stations. This was followed by further destruction of the Spanish warships at Santiago. American troops in Cuba took possession of the island and the war ended, but Congress did not content itself with a simple resolution of this character. Cuba had been oppressed by Spain for centuries and Spanish rule in the West Indies had become intolerable. And although Spain had been rendered helpless and was thoroughly conquered, she was required by treaty to abandon her claim of sovereignty over Cuba and to cede to the American Government the Philippine Islands and other of her possessions. Although the war had ended in 1898 a formal exchange of ratification between the two Governments did not take place until April 11, 1899, and the Attorney General ruled that the war did not end until this exchange.

If the leadership of the Republican Party at that time had been such as it is at this time, when Spain had been defeated and her army had been withdrawn Congress would have simply declared that the war was over. Cuba, the Philippine Islands, and other territory which Spain relinquished would still, under international law, have been Spanish territory. But having proceeded under the constitutional method and having required Spain to make a treaty of peace, the Philippines passed to us, and under our guidance it shall become a self-governing people. And the flag of the Queen of the Antilles was flung to the breeze as an independent sovereignty, and she has already ratified the treaty of Versailles and has become a member of the League of Nations without reservations or interpretations.

We entered the war with Germany because her militaristic spirit had undertaken to dominate the world. Belgium had given her no cause for war, and yet her armies had overcome and trodden down that little Empire. France had given her no cause for war, but the gray lines of the German armies had flowed like a mighty flood almost to the doors of Paris. Every principle of modern warfare had been outraged. Women had been murdered. Children had been trampled under foot of the advancing armies. Merciless submarine warfare had been waged upon every merchant ship that crossed the Atlantic. The Lusitania had gone down with more than 125 of our citizens aboard. She had declared, in effect, that America could not travel the lanes of the sea and had sunk our shipping wherever it had been found. Savage with power, she had determined that Prussian militarism should dominate the world. England and France and Italy were struggling under her fierce attacks when President Wilson called the special session of the Congress of the Nation and told them that the Imperial German Government in total disregard of American rights was destroying our commerce upon the seas, was murdering American citizens, and was, in fact, carrying on war against this Nation. He advised that Congress should immediately declare war and proceed to raise and equip an Army. This was done. Our soldiers ended the war by their courageous spirit and indomitable courage. They were told that they were fighting that all wars might end forever. The armistice itself was signed upon certain definite ideas of justice and right. The President has written these into a treaty of peace which he signed at Paris. As the Constitution has required, he has brought back this treaty of peace and submitted it to the Senate for its consent and advice. This treaty, which Germany was compelled to sign and which has been rejected and returned to the President, carries into effect by its stipulations the destruction of Prussian militarism; it guarantees to this Republic, and to all our allies, all the rights which they won upon the field of battle. If this resolution is to end the war, then this is to be lost to us. Even if Germany should accept the provisions of this resolution and so notify the President that the war was ended in accordance with its provisions and should attempt to waive the rights of its nationals to the property seized by us, we would have ended the war by settling nothing with Germany except some miserable property rights in vessels which were interned in our harbors and the property of individual German citizens.

But what shall we say to our dead and wounded? Is this the answer? More than 150,000, while living, bear the cruel marks of war. More than 50,000 sleep along the western front, at Chateau-Thierry, in the Argonne, and in Flanders fields, where—

* * * poppies grow
Between the crosses, row on row.

From their silent tombs they have cried to us:

To you, from failing hands, we throw
The torch. Be yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die,
We shall not sleep, though poppies blow,
In Flanders fields.

Who has broken faith with our heroic dead? Woodrow Wilson grasped the torch in his illustrious hands. Obedient to the Constitution of his country, he bore it, aflame with the light of justice and glowing with the love of humanity, to the portals of the Senate of the United States. He left it in their keeping. After weary months, the leadership of that body, with sneers and vituperation, returned it to him, the light extinguished by partisan venom and the glow transmuted into the dead ashes of national selfishness. In its stead they now offer this abortive measure. Upon such a record of boasted statesmanship I am constrained to believe that the American people instead of assaulting their Constitution will elect to change this leadership.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of this so-called peace resolution. I am not a constitutional lawyer and shall therefore not attempt to deal with the question of its constitutionality except in a very general way.

The Constitution provides that the power to make treaties shall be vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds of that body concurring. The Constitution vests in the House of Representatives the sole power of impeachment, the exclusive power to decide upon the eligibility and qualifications of its own Members, and the power to initiate all bills for raising revenue for the support of the Government, and so forth. But nowhere does it lodge in the House of Representatives the treaty-making power.

If this resolution is anything, it is a treaty. It proposes to reestablish commercial relations between the United States and Germany, which clearly makes it a treaty. The House therefore has no constitutional jurisdiction over the question; if it has, then the Senate by a majority vote could pass the peace treaty as it came from Versailles in the form of a resolution.

Let us take a concrete case for example. Let us suppose that both the Senate and the House are Democratic by small majorities; that the President presented the treaty of Versailles to the Senate for ratification; and that a majority voted to ratify it, but that it was not a two-thirds majority. Then, if the House has constitutional jurisdiction over this resolution, the purpose of which is to treat with enemy countries, the treaty of Versailles could be put into the form of a resolution, passed by both the House and Senate by a bare majority vote, and be approved by the President, thereby becoming effective without having received a two-thirds majority of the Senate, as required by the Constitution.

It has been cited by the proponents of the resolution that Chile and an enemy country once made a treaty by the passage of a similar resolution, and that Spain and Mexico did likewise; but gentlemen must bear in mind that we are not operating under the constitution of Chile, Spain, or Mexico; we are operating under the Constitution of the United States, which specifically provides that the President shall make treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds of that body concurring. So if the House has not the constitutional power to act upon the resolution, its doing so will only delay a final settlement between the United States and Germany. If it has authority to do so, which I do not concede, then let us see what the resolution purposes to do. Does it purpose to cease hostilities between the United States and Germany? No; hostilities have long since ceased. Does it purpose to demobilize the emergency army? No; the army has already been demobilized. Does it purpose any action looking to the prevention of war in the future? No; it does not. Then, what is its purpose. According to its text, it is to permit the resumption of trade with Germany. Paragraph 1 of section 1 reads:

House joint resolution No. 327 terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States; permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany.

And paragraph 1 of section 3 reads:

That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with the German Government and its nationals, and for this purpose—

And so forth.

We find much in the resolution designed to establish and maintain trade with the German Government, but nowhere do we find a line, a word, or a syllable designed to establish and maintain peace in the immediate or remote future. It is therefore obvious that the author of this resolution is more concerned about the establishment of trade than he is about the establishment of peace, and is more concerned about the maintenance of trade in the future than he is about the maintenance of peace in the future. And if the resolution is adopted and becomes a law it will doubtless serve its purpose to reestablish trade between the United States and Germany and will preclude from further consideration the Versailles treaty, the chief object of which is to restore and maintain the peace of the world, and as I am more interested in the establishment and maintenance of peace than I am in the establishment and maintenance of trade with Germany, I can not support the resolution; as I am more interested in preserving the life and the blood of the young manhood of the country that must fight wars than I am in establishing trade relations with Germany for the purpose of swelling the fortunes of those who happen to be fortunate enough to have goods to sell to Germany, I shall vote against this resolution, which is designed not to preserve peace in the future, not to save the young manhood from future wars, but to establish trade for the benefit of those who do not participate in war when it comes.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, everyone here knows that while this resolution is referred to here as the Porter resolution, it was drafted by Senator KNOX, who is one of the archenemies of that provision of the peace treaty of Versailles which undertakes to prevent future wars, namely, the covenant of the League of Nations, and who was also one of the ablest supporters of the Lodge reservation to the league which provides that the power of economic discrimination shall not be invoked against warring nations except by act of Congress. I will say in passing that, while that reservation was not discussed as extensively as other reservations, it is the reservation most sought by the selfish interests that oppose the League of Nations.

The power of economic discrimination, the exercise of the power of boycott, suggested by Roosevelt, advocated by Taft, and written into the treaty of Versailles by Wilson, if directed against a warring nation, would render it unable to wage a war of any consequence. No nation could wage an effective war if cut off from and ostracized by the rest of the world. But if the power to declare a boycott against a warring nation is withheld from the league or the Executive and can not be exercised until authorized by Congress, we all know what would happen in the event another war should come. The interests engaged in the manufacture and sale of war materials and other supplies would move upon Congress with their powerful influence, and any legislation designed to establish economic discrimination, to exercise the power of boycott, would be debated at the other end of the Capitol, where it is difficult to limit debate, until an ordinary war would be ended or until the whole world would become involved. Everyone who has given any thought to that question knows that any bill designed to stop the shipment of supplies to a warring nation would be talked to death at the other end of the Capitol, or delayed indefinitely by those representing the great manufacturing sections of the country, who do not want their trade interfered with even though such interference may be essential to the maintenance of peace. And it is in that spirit of selfish greed that the League of Nations finds its greatest opposition among those who would maintain commerce at the expense of peace, who would sell goods while the world fights, who would swell their fortunes while the bloom of the world's manhood is sacrificed on the field of battle.

The resolution has another purpose also; it is being used as a means of attempting to pull certain Members of another body out of a hole in which they placed themselves by their temporary defeat of the peace treaty, and I refuse to join in that effort.

We have also heard a great deal of discussion of and a great deal of opposition to that provision of the League of Nations which guarantees the territorial integrity of nations, but a canvass of the opposing forces discloses the fact that they belong to that class of Americans who have been clamoring for years for American intervention in Mexico, and who express the opinion that once the American flag is planted in Mexico it should not and will not be withdrawn; and let it not be forgotten that those same forces criticized Wilson in the 1916 campaign because we were not at war with Mexico, and many of them criticized him because we had not declared war on Germany. They wanted war then and many of them are still urging that we fight Mexico. I heard a prominent Republican, a Member of this House, say a few weeks ago, "We expect to clean up Mexico if we get control of the Government at the next election."

Mr. Speaker, it is true that conditions are bad in Mexico; it is true that there are American investments there that are suffering as a result of those conditions; and it is also true that the invasion and occupation of Mexico by the armed forces of America would cause those investments to multiply ten, a hundred, yea, a thousand fold in value. But that would be worth nothing to the Government of the United States or to the American boys who would be forced to fight the battles. It would benefit only the mighty rich who have elected to invest a portion of their surplus in Mexico. If it is their choice to invest in Mexico instead of investing under the flag of their own country that is their business, but so far as I am concerned, I am unwilling to sacrifice one American boy or spill one drop of American blood to protect their investments or enhance the value of them.

Mr. Speaker, the hope and the prayer of civilization for the last century has been that the day would come when the sword would be supplanted by reason, when nations like individuals would be forced by the power of public opinion to settle their differences in a court of justice instead of on the battle field. And with the completion of the peace treaty of Versailles the world breathed a sigh of relief and felt that the long-hoped for, the long-sought result, had been achieved, and no one doubted that America, which had stood as the world's champion of peaceful settlements of international disputes for a quarter of a century, would hesitate to ratify the treaty. But, alas, out of petty political jealousies and prejudices by the one element and selfish greed by the other an opposing force was organized and put into action which seeks to destroy the glorious opportunities for future peace for which we as a Nation had prayed for a hundred years, and for which American heroes died on the fields of France and Flanders. But I for one shall not despair; I shall continue to hope, as I have since the day we entered the war, that out of the great conflict will come a settlement that will make future wars impossible or reduce them to a minimum. I shall therefore support no resolution or movement that will impede the progress of that great humanitarian movement. I shall vote for the motion to recommit that is to be offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], the purpose of which is to repeal all war legislation; but this resolution is a deception, a sham, and a fraud, and I shall vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, we are asked by the Republicans in this House to do a foolish thing. We are asked by them to do a ridiculous thing. We are asked by our colleagues on the other side of the aisle to do an unlawful thing—to violate the sacred Constitution which each of us has taken a solemn oath to uphold and support—for the Constitution of the United States plainly and clearly provides that all treaty-making power is placed only in the hands of the President and the Senate of the United States. The House of Representatives has nothing whatever to do with it.

Then why has this sham of a so-called resolution of peace with Germany been brought in here by a Republican steering committee under an autocratic rule which allows two whole days of debate, yet will not permit it to be amended in the slightest particular? Dirty Republican politics is the only answer. It is an attempt to camouflage the people of the United States into believing that Republicans tried to bring about peace, when but for their action in the Senate, in killing the peace treaty, there would be peace—dirty Republican politics interfering with the peace of the world, placing pages of unfair, misleading, vicious, hot-air attacks upon the President and his administration in the RECORD, to be franked over the United States in an attempt to win another election.

If only the President had given the United States Senate representation on the peace commission there would have been no opposition to the treaty of peace. We are victims of pique. If on his return from war-stricken Europe with the signed instrument that tends to make future war impossible the President had not been accorded such great ovation from the American people from Columbus, Ohio, across the United States, there would not be this continued effort on the part of Republicans to discredit him, to embarrass him, to hamper him, to jibe him, to persecute him, aye, even to destroy him, if possible; for his greatness worries our Republican friends. It disturbs them; it disquiets them; it unnerves them; it makes them apprehensive; early in the morning, at noontime, in the evening, and late at night it somnambulates them, and they can not rest. Verily, we are victims of pique, of enviousness, of covetousness, of political hatred.

The great Theodore Roosevelt was in favor of just such a League of Nations to prevent war.

The great William Howard Taft is in favor of just such a League of Nations to prevent war.

In 1916 the great Henry Cabot Lodge was in favor of just such a League of Nations to prevent war, for in his speech here in Washington before the League to Enforce Peace, on May 16, 1916, he said:

The limit of voluntary arbitration has, I think, been reached. Much has been achieved by it. It has taken out of the range of arms a large mass of questions which once were causes, frequently of war, constantly of reprisals, and by the general consent of civilized mankind has put them before a tribunal and had them there decided. If we have reached the limit of voluntary arbitration, what is the next step? I think the next step is that which this league proposes, and that is to put force behind international peace.

We may not solve it in that way, but if we can not solve it in that way it can be solved in no other.

But alas, the President did not give the United States Senate representation on the peace commission. The President was becoming too popular and beloved in the United States. The people were forgetting to applaud anyone else. The President's Democratic Party was becoming too much in the limelight and gathering too great a following. Something had to be done to stop it, else it presaged harm for Republican hopes during the years to come. But more important than all else, if this League of Nations plan and the President's treaty of peace were adopted it would stop the manufacture of war munitions; it would close up a lot of Republican gun and munition factories, and they would have to change their machinery to create more useful utensils; the war program would stop; the war-preparation program of 1916 would stop; the $50,000,000 dreadnoughts would not be built; the arms, ammunition, supplies, and equipment for a great Navy and a great Army would not be sold; and the immense profits anticipated by the Republican plutocrat manufacturers who furnish all the Republican campaign funds would not go into their already bulging pockets, but would be kept in the pockets of the people, out of which otherwise the same would be taken through increased taxation. And under such pressure of political hysterics our Republican steering committee is cramming this absurd, meaningless thing down our throats.

When it passes by Republican votes, what will be accomplished? Absolutely nothing. Will there be peace? No; and our Republican friends know it. Millions of men, women, and little children throughout Europe will still suffer the outrages of anarchy now menacing the enemy country until a treaty of peace is entered into in a constitutional way, and this country will still remain in a state of disquiet and turmoil until the people elect a Senate that will ratify a proper treaty.

The same Republican colleagues of ours who are now forcing this sham through the House are the ones who have voted for an Army several times the size that would be necessary had the treaty been ratified, and are the same ones who voted for a Navy program several times the size that would be necessary had the treaty been adopted, for had the treaty been ratified every country would have begun to disarm, would have reduced its standing army, would have stopped its navy program in the line of building battleships that serve no useful purpose whatever out of war and are a dead expense to every Government, and would have stopped over half of its annual expenditure now made necessary in keeping up departments attending to the war program. They are the same Republican friends who have been trying to curse this Republic with compulsory military training, that will take all of the young men in this country from their homes and put them into the camps to learn bloody warfare. They are against furnishing a few police to assist our allies in keeping the peace of the world and preventing cruel war in the future, but they want to build dreadnoughts, maintain a big fighting Navy, manned with boys taken forcibly from the farms and businesses of the country, maintain a big standing army, garner war engines, war munitions, buy millions of war supplies annually, and turn our friendly allies against us, so that if Republican munition sellers can ever inveigle our country into some fuss with another, we can use all of the man power of this country from 15 and 16 year old boys up to fight the combined powers of the world. That is what our Republican friends seem to be in favor of doing.

I am for peace. I am against war. I am in favor of reducing to the lowest minimum the chances of war in the future. When I ran for this office in 1916 one plank in my platform was the following:

INTERNATIONAL PEACE.

In a short time the world will have had enough of war. We must find a permanent solution of this question and make it impossible for any country to successfully declare war, and at the same time provide a just and adequate means of honorable settlement of all international disputes.

I am against a large standing army. I am against building these helpless battleships and dreadnoughts, costing hundreds of millions, which would not be needed with a League of Nations. I am against compulsory military training. When you go to take an 18 or 19 year old boy out of a home now that has one or more loved ones buried in France to send him to a training camp each year during peace time you are going to hear from the fathers and mothers of this country. The people of a county enforce peace in that county. The people of a State enforce peace in that State. The people of the United States enforce peace in the United States. But when the peace of the world is involved, it is the nations of the world that should enforce it. "United we stand, divided we fall" is just as true when applied to the civilized nations of the world concerning the peace of the world as it is true of the United States when applicable only to the peace of the United States.

This Republican sham resolution will accomplish nothing when passed. Republicans are camouflaging when they say that they want war-time laws repealed. We Democrats have wanted these laws, such as the Lever Act, which has cost the producers of the country hundreds of millions of dollars, repealed ever since the armistice was signed. We are going to give you Republican colleagues of ours a chance to vote on the subject of repealing these war-time laws, for the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], who has charge of this debate on the floor, is going to offer the following substitute for your sham so-called peace resolution, which substitute will read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all acts and joint resolutions of Congress which have been passed since April 6, 1917, and which by their terms are to be effective only for the period of the war, or for the present and existing emergency, or until a treaty of peace should be ratified, or until the proclamation by the President of the ratification of a treaty of peace, are hereby repealed; and all such acts and resolutions which by their terms are to be effective only during and for a specified period after such war, or such present or existing emergency, or the ratification of such treaty, or the proclamation by the President of the ratification of such treaty are hereby repealed, which repeal shall be effective at the end of the specified period, such specified period being construed as beginning on the date of the final passage of this resolution.

Now, this substitute to be offered by our Democratic colleague from Virginia will repeal all of the emergency war-time laws, and if you Republicans are sincere in wanting them repealed you can repeal them. But every Republican in this House, whipped into line by your party leaders, will vote against this Flood substitute, and will thereby prevent these war-time laws from being repealed, and the responsibility of keeping such laws effective will be on you Republicans.

This Congress has declared a state of war to exist between this Government and not only the Imperial German Government but also the Royal Austro-Hungarian Government. Why the urgent necessity of now by this sham resolution declaring peace with one and not with the other?

On April 6, 1917, this Congress passed the following resolution:

Whereas the Imperial German Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

And notwithstanding the fact that the power to end this war through a treaty of peace is by the Constitution placed solely with the President and Senate of the United States, the Republican steering committee of this House seeks to make this House look ridiculous in the eyes of the whole world through the passage by their party vote alone of this sham resolution of so-called peace, now before the House, which means nothing.

What are these Republicans going to do with the other declaration of war against the Royal Austro-Hungarian Government? Are we still to be left at war with Germany's main allies, though put at so-called peace with Germany? This Republican action is ridiculous even to the children of our country, who understand such camouflage.

In the Star-Telegram, published at Forth Worth, Tex., issue of last Tuesday, April 6, 1920, is a splendid editorial predicting that the Texas delegation will register its 18 votes solidly against this foolish measure, indicating that its ulterior, vicious purpose and design will fool no intelligent person.

Now examine the other declaration of war, concerning which no action is taken. On December 7, 1917, this Congress passed the following:

Whereas the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That a state of war is hereby declared to exist between the United States of America and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

Why do Republicans want to remain at war with the Royal Austro-Hungarian Government? Why is it not just as important for the House of Representatives to assume functions not given by our Constitution and declare peace with the Austro-Hungarian Government as with Germany? This House of Representatives will have wasted two whole days and thousands of dollars in this useless, resultless debate, without accomplishing anything. The people of this country are going to hold you Republicans responsible for such incompetency, waste, and inefficiency.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, everyone admits that the end sought by the resolution under consideration is a most desirable one. The sole question is whether the Congress has the power to pass the resolution. That being the only question at issue, I pass to a discussion of it.

Section 1 of the resolution simply declares that the war is at an end. There can be and is no dispute that, as a matter of fact, it is at an end. The two questions involved are: Does its ending in fact so terminate it in law as to invest the Congress with the power to make the declaration which it attempts to make by this section? As a general rule, well recognized by all the authorities on international law, wars may end by the long-continued suspension of hostilities. There has been such suspension here for 18 months—surely a long enough time of itself and alone to bring us within this general rule. But we have much more than a simple suspension of hostilities; the halting of the war was inaugurated by a solemn written agreement of armistice, executed with the usual formalities by the contending countries, providing not alone for the suspension of hostilities but for the conclusion of a treaty of peace and stipulating as much in detail as could be done in the haste required in such a document the terms upon which peace should be concluded.

In pursuance of the preliminary agreement negotiations promptly followed the signing of the armistice, which were delayed a most unusual time, not because of disputes between Germany and the Allies, but solely on account of the difficulties among the Allies themselves in agreeing upon the terms of another instrument, included in but no part of the peace treaty, creating a League of Nations, to which, for a considerable time at least, Germany was not even to be admitted.

So there is and there can be no dispute that, in fact and in law, the war is at an end. The question remains whether Congress has the power to declare that the war has ended. No question is raised except as to whether it involves the assumption by Congress of the treaty-making power. Congress does not attempt by this declaration to make a treaty or even to negotiate with Germany. It does nothing more than to recognize an indisputable fact, proven by incontrovertible evidence. As the war has terminated by the suspension of hostilities and it does not attempt to make a treaty or even to negotiate with Germany by doing so, the Congress, under its general legislative power, would clearly have the right to declare by resolution the fact and settle all questions on the subject in the business community and among the people generally. The Supreme Court has recognized the right of Congress to pass such a resolution under peculiar circumstances, and while the case then under consideration was not one of a world war, the principle upon which the case was decided was that some public proclamation of legislation would seem to be required to inform those whose private rights were affected by it of the time when it terminated—United States v. Anderson (9 Wall., 56)—and that principle applies with equal force and necessity here.

Section 2 of the act simply repeals war-time legislation. It is assumed that the minority report contains the sober, well-considered views of those who oppose this legislation, and it is conceded in that report that the Congress has power to repeal this legislation. (General statement, top p. 3.)

Section 3 provides for the resumption of trade relations with Germany. It can not be disputed that Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. That power is expressly conferred upon Congress by subdivision 3 of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, and can not be disputed. The question involved is whether the Congress seeks to exceed this power by imposing certain conditions upon Germany, requiring her to assent to them and give us notice of her assent, and prohibiting intercourse of all kinds between the two countries in the event that she fails to fully comply with these conditions. It is strenuously urged that Congress is exceeding its powers in imposing and requiring an assent to these conditions, because—

(1) Any encroachment upon the treaty-making power by Congress is unconstitutional; and (2) the imposing of the conditions and requiring an assent to them is such an encroachment.

I deny both of these propositions. What has been settled by legal decision is much more conclusive than the best of argument, and it has been settled by the decision of our Supreme Court that under the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations the Congress has the power to provide in a tariff law that foreign nations which comply with certain conditions imposed by the act shall enjoy exceptional privileges conferred by it. The only difference between such a tariff law and section 3 is that by the terms of the section under consideration the German Government is required to notify us of its assent, while in the tariff law the giving of such notice was not required. However, it can not seriously be contended that the giving of this notice can make any material difference. In both cases the provisions are in substance the same: A foreign country is given certain trade benefits, provided it complies with certain conditions. The important thing is, not notifying us that it has complied, but compliance.

Besides, the argument that section 3 is void if it encroaches in the slightest degree on the treaty-making power is not well founded. By subdivision 17 of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, Congress is given power—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

However, the fact that one of the three coordinate branches of the Government encroaches by its acts on a function properly belonging to one of the two other branches is not even evidence that the act so done is unconstitutional.

This is well recognized by the authorities.

It has from the beginning been necessary to vest in each of the three departments of Government certain powers which, in their essential nature, would not belong to it. * * * The courts have been given the legislative power to establish rules of practice and procedure and the executive power to appoint certain officials—sheriffs, criers, bailiffs, clerks, etc.; the legislature has been given the judicial powers of impeachment and of judging of the qualifications of its own members, and the Senate the essentially executive power of participating in the appointment of civil officials; and the Executive has been granted the legislative veto power and the judicial right of pardoning. (Willoughby on the Constitution, vol. 2, 1262–1263.)

From this quotation it is obvious that the encroachment by one of the branches on the powers and functions of the other is not infrequent and often recognized as valid, and the question is whether or not the principal act done is one within the powers of the Congress and the encroachment only incidental to the carrying out of the principal act. Congress is given the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations and to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution that power. It becomes necessary for Congress in regulating commerce with Germany, a nation with which we have ceased to be at war but with which we have waged a war, to impose certain restrictions, the necessary consequences of that war. In imposing these conditions Congress has the right to do what it has heretofore done in passing tariff laws containing reciprocity provisions. It could not for a moment be contended that the provisions contained in these tariff laws were the only provisions which could be imposed. The fact has been recognized that Congress has the right to impose conditions, and that is what it is doing and all that it is doing now. The circumstance that the conditions imposed are described in a certain document does not bring the document referred to in question here at all, except for a description of the conditions.

So, it is evident that even if we incidentally encroach on the treaty-making power, this would not make the legislation unconstitutional unless the encroachment was the main and principal thing which was done and not a mere incident of the exercise of the power to regulate foreign commerce, which we are granted.

It is exceedingly clear that we do not encroach at all, however, on the treaty-making power. The armistice has been signed. It defines, in a general way, the terms on which the treaty shall be concluded. It stands in the same relation to a treaty that a land contract would stand to a deed. The parties have entered into this preliminary arrangement which defines their rights and the United States can insist on its rights either under the armistice or in a treaty to be concluded in accordance with its terms.

The gentleman from Texas says that if we have the right to declare peace now, we had the same right to declare it while hostilities were being actively waged—in the midst of one of the drives. In making such a declaration he misses entirely the point under consideration. This is not a declaration that the war shall end, but simply a recognition by solemn declaration of the circumstance that the war has long since ended. During the continuance of the war the only right of Congress would be to end it by refusing to grant appropriations, but when once the war is ended Congress has the right to declare the fact.

The gentleman from Texas, too, very eloquently refers to the wonderful services of our boys in the Great War, which has ended with such a splendid victory owing to their bravery and devotion. He seems to urge that in some way it is to their interest to have a technical state of war continued. This would be a bad return for all the wonderful services they have rendered their country. We should not permit them to return to a country where they have won peace by their sacrifices of life and vigor, and impair and lessen the prosperity of the country by continuing a technical state of war when the real war has ended. It is our duty to make the country as prosperous as possible. We should give them the best opportunities that a prosperous country can afford them, and not ask them to resume the duties, obligations, and routine of civil life under discouraging circumstances by saying, as we would say by the defeat of this resolution, something that is not true, something that is not the fact, that a state of war exists when those boys have by their arms and by their valor ended that war.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank God in this hour that I am not a constitutional lawyer. [Laughter and applause.] I am not even a curbstone lawyer. I have heard this question discussed by constitutional lawyers and by curbstone lawyers and none of them have impressed me. [Laughter.]

Now, it does not take a constitutional lawyer to know that the House of Representatives has nothing whatever to do with negotiating a treaty. The Constitution very clearly provides that such authority lies in the hands of the President and the Senate. There can be no question about the letter or the intent of the provision of the Constitution. But in this peculiar case which lies before us the condition of war into which we entered in April, 1917, can be summarily ended without the necessity of any negotiations. We have not only defeated the Government with which we were at war, but we have annihilated it. [Applause.] It no longer exists. The Imperial German Government has as completely disappeared as the imperial government of Napoleon or of Augustus. There is as a matter of law and of fact no government in Germany with which we were at war, and consequently no government in Germany with which we are bound of necessity to negotiate at all. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Kaiser, the head of the old Imperial German Government, is now an exile in an asylum State. No longer does his imperious will sway and control the German people. He is now content to saw wood within peaceful Holland. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that it is within the power of Congress to say by resolution that the war we waged with a vanquished Government has, like that Government itself, ceased to exist; and if we deny the right of Congress to declare that this war has ceased, we deny the right of Congress to state an accomplished fact. In other words, we assert that it is unconstitutional for the Congress of the United States to say that something has happened which every child knows has happened. To talk about the President and the Senate being compelled to go hand in hand to Germany to ask for terms of peace is to talk as the foolish talk. [Applause.]

Every sensible man knows quite well that Germany in her present exhausted and chaotic condition will consent to whatever terms of negotiation the President and the Senate, in the exercise of their constitutional authority, may present to the German Government. Nor, in case that Germany should demur, would it be necessary either to resume military and naval warfare or even to threaten the resumption of warfare; a mere threat of breaking off commercial relations would bring the German Government to submission at once, because Germany can not possibly continue to exist, much less hope to get again upon her feet industrially, if the great markets of the United States were closed to her exports. The Congress clearly having the right to declare that the war has ceased, the only question to be answered is whether Congress should take that action at once.

To this question there can be but one answer.

In the interest of our own trade and commerce it is highly necessary that untrammeled communication between the United States and Germany should begin at once, or else, when we do open the highways to the German markets, we will find them couped by the commercial invasion of England and other competitive nations.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another point. At this very moment, while we gather here, well clothed, well fed, and comfortable, there are literally millions of men, women, and children in Europe dying from lack of food, from lack of medicines, from lack of every convenience and necessity which make civilized life comfortable, and which make even life itself possible.

If some inhuman ashman were to place a cage here on the floor of this House and exhibit the skeleton form of one little baby being slowly starved to death, there is not a man in this House who would not rush to rescue the little victim and kill its inhuman tormentor; and yet in Germany, in Austria, in Hungary, and in Russia there are literally millions of little babes who die slowly before their mothers' and fathers' eyes, in the agonies of starvation, and we, civilized Americans, are asked to let this hideous spectacle of awful agony continue until certain gentlemen can debate for several more months the important question as to whether the majesty of the Executive and the dignity of the Senate would be outraged by a simple declaration of fact by the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, to sum up, may I say that on this question and in this hour I can not give to my party what I owe to humanity? [Applause.] I am for peace now, and I propose to vote for this resolution with a conscience that is clear and a conviction that I hope is an honest conviction. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I yield to no man in this great legislative body or elsewhere in a sincere desire to see this magnificent Republic at peace within its own borders and at peace with all the nations of the world. I am a man of peace, and every fiber of my nature at all times yearns for peace and quietude and abhors war and unrest. Therefore I would go a long ways—even to the extreme limit—to have peace and end war.

I shall never forget as long as life lasts how awful and solemn I felt in my innermost heart, under the most terrible responsibility resting upon me, when we declared by act of Congress on April 6, 1917, that a state of war existed between the Imperial German Government and the United States of America; when I came to the full realization of the fact that real war, so long dreaded by us, was on in earnest between our country and the Government of the arch enemy of civilization and mankind—the German Kaiser. Neither will I ever forget the gladness and the joy that filled my soul when real hostilities came to an end with the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918. The burden that had been on my heart with ever-increasing weight, if possible, from the day we entered the war was rolled away by the joyous voice of victory and the resultant prospect of permanent peace not only for our own country, but for the world.

I shall never forget how glad I was to see our brave boys returning home to their loved ones in a blaze of glory, resplendent with honor, and aglow with the purest patriotism, having achieved a triumphant victory over autocracy and despotism and established as we believed the democracy and freedom of the world. While filled with joy to see these thus return, we felt the sadness produced because others of our noble boys had paid the supreme sacrifice to bring about this glorious result; but we found comfort and solace in believing they had not died in vain, but had wrought well for the future of mankind and in their sacrificial blood had written another chapter in the history of America which would shine on with ever-increasing brilliancy and glory to the end of time. Never will I forget how we watched the supreme efforts of our great President to make secure the results obtained by these noble American soldier and sailor boys in securing the execution and the signing of a permanent treaty of peace.

How America rejoiced when it was signed and we believed war was to be no more and world peace had been made secure; but, alas, the Senate of the United States has rejected that treaty, although it has been ratified by 32 of the civilized nations of the world, including all our allies in the war and all the nations who signed the treaty with us. Only the United States, of the nations signing it, has failed to ratify it. The Senate by refusing to ratify the treaty has caused the United States to turn away from all our allies and those who signed the treaty with us and practically all the civilized nations of the earth and placed us in the company of China and Russia. They did not sign the treaty, and hence did not ratify it. We did sign it and then refused to ratify it. We are standing alone with superstitious China and bolshevik Russia. Do you think the people of America will be proud of the company we are placed in by this action of the Senate?

Nay, verily. Now, we are called upon by you Republicans to violate our oaths of office and pass this resolution, which is contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution of our country. You hope thereby to try to make a separate peace with Germany in a little, short resolution of a few lines, which is not worth the paper it is written on, but which if effective would cause us to prove faithless to our allies, who sacrificed the blood of millions of their brave men and billions of their treasure in a righteous and common cause with us, and in addition to that cause us to turn our backs upon the 32 civilized nations who signed the treaty with us and have ratified it, thereby standing by their agreement to aid in its enforcement to secure permanent world peace and prevent wars for all time. You would also have us turn aside from the ideals of our brave soldier boys, who fought our battles and won victory. We will not do it.

By proposing this resolution you are trying to practice a deception and a fraud upon the American people. If it should become law, it would be a nullity, because it violates the Constitution, and it could not and would not bring about the peace so much desired. One party to a war can not make a treaty of peace by resolution or otherwise, and you know that. You are not sincere in this grandstand flourish of trumpet's play. It is a barrage; it is a camouflage.

It takes the agreement of both parties, solemnly entered into by a contract, by a treaty, to secure peace, and a treaty can only be negotiated by the President, and must be ratified by two-thirds of the Senate.

The President, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, is the treaty-making power. The House of Representatives has nothing on earth to do with it, and to-day you are doing a vain, foolish, and ineffective thing. It would be funny, indeed it would be perfectly ridiculous, if you were not dealing with such a tragic and solemn situation. Now, let us see what this resolution proposes to do. In section 1 it proposes "that the state of war" * * * "is hereby declared at an end." Such a thing never before in the history of this Republic was attempted to be done except through the instrumentality of a treaty, solemnly entered into between the belligerent nations.

In section 2 it provides that all the war measures in which it is provided they shall terminate upon the termination of the war shall terminate when this resolution becomes effective.

That is a legislative power, and if you are honest and sincere in desiring the repeal of the war legislation, we Democrats will give you an opportunity to do that by voting for our motion to recommit to be offered by Mr. FLOOD. If it is adopted it will repeal the war measures outright and leave no doubt about it. Will you vote for it? No; you will vote against it, thereby demonstrating your insincerity and your determination in the sacred name of peace to impose upon the credulity of the American people and deceive them if you can. I warn you now you will not be able to do it. The people will see your hypocrisy and visit upon you their just censure and condemnation.

Section 3 requires that to secure reciprocal trade with Germany the German Government must, within 45 days after the passage of this resolution, notify the President that it has declared the war ended and that it waives all claims, demands, and benefits against the United States. In other words, it says to Germany, "You must accept the treaty of Versailles, although we have not ratified it." The resolution refers to the treaty specifically; it makes reference to its terms and makes the acceptance of those terms a part of the proposed settlement in effecting peace. This is clearly nothing less than an attempt to make a treaty by a resolution of Congress, and is unconstitutional and would be wholly ineffective to accomplish that result.

Section 4 provides that any of our citizens found trading with Germany during the time when trade with them is not permitted shall be fined not more than $10,000 or be sent to the penitentiary for not more than two years.

Section 5 provides that we shall not waive any of our rights secured under the armistice or forfeit anything acquired during the war by reason of our participation in the war—simply another treaty provision which can not be made certain by simply "resoluting" ourselves.

Such provisions as are here proposed can only be made valid when secured by treaty. How are treaties made? The Constitution of the United States says: "He—the President—shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." Then if the President is given the power, by and with the advice of two-thirds of the Senators, to make treaties, certainly the House of Representatives has no part or parcel in the treaty-making power of the Government. All our diplomatic affairs, and a treaty is a diplomatic affair, belong to the executive branch of our Government and not to the legislative branch. The Constitutional Convention fixed that beyond question. They provided "that Congress shall have power to declare war," but denied to Congress the power "to declare peace."

In the Constitutional Convention an amendment was offered to add after the words "to declare war" the words "and to declare peace," and the amendment was unanimously voted down and defeated, thereby showing that the Constitution makers denied Congress the power "to declare peace," and provided that that power should be vested in the President to be exercised by making a treaty to secure and to proclaim peace. As a further unanswerable proof of that fact I offer the history of our country during all the years of our existence as to the unbroken procedure adopted to secure peace at the conclusion of all the wars in which we have engaged. During our national existence up to the time of this great World War we were engaged in the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, and the Spanish-American War—four great wars with foreign countries.

How were they terminated, by a resolution of Congress? No, sirs; not at all. They were terminated by a treaty of peace at the end of each of the wars. To substantiate this statement I call your attention to the following memorandum furnished me by the Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress. Now, listen; here it is. It comes from a nonpartisan, unbiased, authoritative source and is a simple statement of the truth of our history:

[Library of Congress—Legislative Reference Service.]

TERMINATION OF WARS IN WHICH THE U. S. WAS INVOLVED.

In every case in which the United States has been involved in a war, the termination of this hostile state has been effected through a treaty of peace. The following memorandum shows the mode followed by the United States in its four wars with foreign countries.

Memorandum on peace negotiations in wars of the United States with foreign countries.

TREATY OF PARIS, SEPT. 3, 1783.

The commissioners appointed at the close of the Revolutionary War, June 14, 1781 (Journals of Continental Congress, v. 20, pp. 647–648)—John Adams, John Jay, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and Henry Laurens—were chosen by the Congress under the old Articles of Confederation (1781–1789). This Congress was a unicameral body, and owing to the absence of any provision under the "articles" for a Federal executive it exercised both legislative and executive functions. Being the sole piece of Federal machinery, the right of appointment was naturally vested in it (Journals of Congress, v. 4, p. 80; also Butler, C. H., Treaty-making power of the U. S., V. I, C. V).

The provisional treaty of peace was signed at Paris Nov. 30, 1782, and the definitive treaty was signed on Sept. 3, 1783. It was ratified by Congress Jan. 14, 1784, and proclaimed Jan. 14, 1784.

On April 17, 1813, President Madison, having accepted the offer of the Russian Government to mediate between the United States and Great Britain, appointed Albert Gallatin, James A. Bayard, and John Quincy Adams as envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain. On May 29, 1813, Madison sent these nominations to the Senate for confirmation. A debate immediately arose as to whether the functions of the Secretary of the Treasury, which office Gallatin was then holding, were compatible with those of envoy extraordinary. On July 19, 1813, the Senate confirmed the nominations of Bayard and Adams, but by the close vote of 18 to 17 rejected the nomination of Gallatin. (Adams, H., History of the U. S., 1801–1817, V. VII, pp. 1–65.)

The British Government now refused to accept the offer of Russian mediation, and instead offered to treat directly with the United States. This offer President Madison hastened to accept, and on Jan. 14, 1814, he nominated John Quincy Adams, James A. Bayard, Henry Clay, and Jonathan Russell as the new commissioners to negotiate directly with Great Britain. (Adams, H., History of the U. S., 1801–1817, V. VII, pp. 339–370.)

Four days later, Jan. 18, 1814, with but little opposition in the Senate, these nominations were confirmed. On Feb. 9, 1814, Gallatin was once more nominated by President Madison as one of the envoys to negotiate the treaty of peace with Great Britain, and on this occasion his appointment was promptly confirmed by the Senate. (Adams, H., History of the U. S., 1801–1817, V. VII, pp. 371–372; V. IX, pp. 52–58.)

On Dec. 24, 1814, the treaty was signed at Ghent. On Feb. 15, 1815, President Madison transmitted the treaty to the Senate, and on the following day it was unanimously agreed to by that body. On Feb. 17, 1815, it was ratified by the President; ratifications were exchanged Feb. 17, 1815; and on Feb. 18, 1815, the treaty was proclaimed.

TREATY OF GUADALUPE HIDALGO, FEB. 2, 1848.

(Mexican War.)

On April 10, 1847, immediately after the news of the American victory at Buena Vista and the occupation by American troops of the important town Vera Cruz, President Polk, upon the advice of James Buchanan, Secretary of State, decided to appoint a representative or commissioner to negotiate a treaty of peace with Mexico. Nicholas Trist, chief clerk of the Department of State, was chosen for this commission, and on April 16, 1847, in great secrecy, and under an assumed name, he left for

New Orleans with a project of a treaty drawn up by President Polk and his Cabinet. (Rives, G. L., U. S. and Mexico, 1821–1848, V. II, pp. 424–428.)

On Monday, September 6, 1848, Trist had a final conference with the Mexican plenipotentiaries, who flatly refused to accept the American project, and instead offered a counterproject which Trist declared wholly inadmissible. President Polk now decided to recall Trist, and on October 6, 1847, instructions to that effect were forwarded. (Rives, G. L., U. S. and Mexico, 1821–1848, v. II, pp. 520–521.)

Trist, however, despite his instructions, remained in Mexico, and on February 2, 1848, formally concluded a treaty with the Mexican plenipotentiaries. This treaty arrived in Washington on February 19, 1848, was accepted by the President, and on February 22d was sent to the Senate, where, after a long and spirited debate, it was agreed to on March 10, 1848. (Ex. Journal, v. 31, pt. 2, pp. 1161, 1284.) It was ratified by the President on March 16, 1848; ratifications were exchanged on May 30, 1848; and the treaty proclaimed July 4, 1848.

TREATY OF PARIS, DEC. 10, 1898.

(Spanish-American War.)

On August 12, 1898, M. Cambon, the French ambassador to the United States, was authorized by the Spanish Government to sign a protocol suspending hostilities between the United States and Spain. In accordance with the fifth article of this protocol President McKinley on August 26, 1898, appointed five commissioners to represent the United States in the negotiations for peace—William R. Day, who resigned the office of Secretary of State to head this mission; Cushman K. Davis (Republican from Minnesota), chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations; William P. Frye (Republican from Maine and a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations), president pro tempore of the Senate; George Gray (Democrat from Delaware and also a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations); and Whitelaw Reid, editor of the New York Tribune. (Congressional Directory, 55th Cong., 2d sess., Dec. 1897, pp. 26, 55, 68, 149–151; ibid, 56th Cong., 1st sess., Dec. 1899, pp. 40, 54. Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, v. 14, pp. 6321–6322.)

On December 10, 1898, at Paris, the treaty of peace was signed by the commissioners of both Spain and the United States. On January 4, 1899, President McKinley transmitted it to the Senate, where, on February 6, 1899, ratifications were advised by a vote of 57 to 27. On the same day, February 6, 1899, the treaty was ratified by the President; ratifications were exchanged April 11, 1899; and the treaty proclaimed April 11, 1899.

Now, then, if the Constitutional Convention said Congress should not have the power "to declare peace," but did say in the Constitution that the President did have that power conferred upon him in authorizing him to "make treaties," to be ratified by the Senate, and that course has been followed since September 3, 1783, upon which date the treaty of Paris was signed which ended the Revolutionary War, up to this, the 9th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1920, "without deviation or shadow of turning," I ask you, my Republican friends, where you get your authority, either from Constitution, international law, or precedent, to end this great World War by a little five-section resolution of Congress? You know you have no such authority and you can not point to any in the Constitution, in international law, or in the precedents of this Republic.

In your attempt to deceive the people by calling this a "peace resolution" and in passing it by your votes you will but stultify yourselves, violate the Constitution you swore to support, and make yourselves the laughingstock of the people of this country and the people of foreign lands. I will not join you in such a foolish, vain, and nonsensical performance. You say it is a "peace resolution." I say it would be more appropriately styled "a resolution to involve America in more difficulties, more complex situations, more friction, and possibly more war," because it might bring about diplomatic complications and friction with other nations, who already distrust us because we have rejected absolutely the treaty which we signed with 32 other nations, all of whom have ratified it, and we stand alone in rejecting it.

But you say as a justification for undertaking this unconstitutional and unheard-of proceeding that you want to restore domestic peace and normal conditions by repealing the war legislation. Well, we will see whether you are sincere in that statement. We will give you a chance and put you to the test. You have had since this Congress met on the 19th day of last May to repeal war legislation, and you promised the people to repeal it and pass reconstruction legislation in its stead, and you are in the majority in the House and in the Senate, but you have as usual proven false to your promises, deceived the people again, and up to this good hour you have not repealed a single war law or passed a single reconstruction statute. But you say you want to do it now. All right.

Mr. FLOOD will offer the following motion to recommit:

That House joint resolution No. 327 be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions to the committee to report the same to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

Strike out all the preamble and all after the enacting clause and insert following the enacting clause the following:

"That all acts and joint resolutions of Congress which have been passed since April 6, 1917, and which by their terms are to be effective only for the period of the war, or for the present or existing emergency, or until a treaty of peace should be ratified, or until the proclamation by the President of the ratification of a treaty of peace, are hereby repealed; and all such acts and resolutions which by their terms are to be effective only during and for a specified period after such war, or such present or existing emergency, or the ratification of such treaty, or the proclamation by the President of the ratification of such treaty are hereby repealed, which repeal shall be effective at the end of the specified period, such specified period being construed as beginning on the date of the final passage of this resolution."

We propose a legislative proposition, and if you will pass Mr. FLOOD's motion it is constitutional and will effectively repeal the war laws now on the statute books. The Democrats practically to a man are going to vote for it, and I am going to vote for it, because we want domestic peace and normal conditions.

Will you Republicans make good your statement that you want domestic peace and normal conditions and make good your preelection promises to the people by voting for it and thus secure the repeal of these war laws? If you fail to vote for it—if you vote against it—you will again expose your hypocrisy and insincerity by losing this certain, definite, and specific opportunity to pass a law to repeal these irritating, objectionable, and burdensome war measures, the enacting of which was made necessary by the war and for which there is no other justification. So turn aside once from your partisanship and give your better nature and your patriotism a chance and join us in the repeal of these war measures. Will you do it? We will see very soon.

Now, in conclusion, let me reiterate with all the earnestness of my nature, I am for peace. I never wanted war, but am now and have always been against war, where it could with honor and safety to our people be avoided. When we had no other alternative but war or dishonor we preferred to fight and did fight for the preservation of our national honor and the security of our institutions and the safety of our people, and to destroy autocracy and despotism and to establish democracy and preserve liberty. And our brave boys won a glorious victory, and I for one am opposed to throwing away the results to which that victory entitles us. Yes; I want peace, but I want a sure-enough peace, secured in the proper way, and then it will be, as it should be, a lasting peace; otherwise it will not. Therefore, in this august presence at this solemn hour I pray God to give us abiding peace within our borders and with all the world, to the end that our people may enjoy contentment, happiness, and prosperity in the full realization of universal peace and the hope at least that there will be no more war evermore. May God preserve our great Republic and bless all our law-abiding, liberty-loving, loyal, and patriotic people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for half a minute.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, under the authority conferred on Congress by the Constitution, Congress on April 6, 1917, declared a state of war to exist between this country and the Imperial Government of Germany. I voted for that resolution, as our American sovereignty could no longer subsist if we submitted to Germany's attempted dominion over our undoubted international rights. It was an epoch-making resolution, of stupendous significance, not only to the world of to-day, but to generations yet unborn. All criticism of that vote has died, if any ever had existence, and every thoughtful person now realizes that no other course was consistent with the honor and safety of this Nation.

As we are now considering the powers of this House to officially end what that resolution initiated, a brief résumé of the congressional history from that date does not seem inappropriate. I speak to some extent of my own part in it, not that it was in any sense as important as that of others, but for the personal touch which generally lends interest to a subject of discussion.

The first great act was the selective draft. I believe of all the important measures enacted by Congress it contributed most to the successful issue of the war. It came with a minority report from the Committee on Military Affairs, but it is a great satisfaction to me to recall I was one of the eight minority members of that committee who successfully carried it through the House in the face of the opposition of many of the leaders. It was novel legislation and its enactment as an initiative method of raising armies was contrary to all precedent. Under its provisions, however, 4,000,000 men, carefully selected so as least to disturb industry, were speedily mobilized. Vast sums of money had to be raised, in all aggregating, with the loans to our allies, $34,000,000,000. Such sums had never been dreamed of before in the history of the world. Aladdin with his lamp had never pictured to the imagination of the East such vast treasures.

As a member of the great Committee on Military Affairs, I had my part in framing one appropriation bill alone which carried $14,000,000,000.

New methods of taxation had to be devised so as to place the enormous burden on those best able to bear it. Taxation was laid so as to reach as far as practicable those who were reaping a profit out of the war. "Work or fight," "Make no dollars out of this war," were the slogans of the day as applied to labor and capital. Time was all important and money had to be spent, not with economy in view, but solely to get immediate results. Great factories for all possible supplies had to be established, enlarged, or pushed to the utmost capacity, and the country to a certain extent must finance them. Wharves and piers and all forms of facilities for handling shipments rose like magic at many terminals both in this country and in Europe. Congress made this possible. The telephone and telegraph systems, in order to give priority to governmental service and to prevent hostile use, were taken over by the Government and operated as governmental agencies under legislative sanction. The great railroad systems and all methods of transportation became crowded far beyond capacity, and legislation was enacted by which these great public agencies passed under governmental control. Priority of shipment and priority of service were regulated by authority of law.

After the armistice it was necessary to provide for the return of the railroad systems to private ownership. This must be done without burden upon the public and without peril to the business interests dependent upon the transportation systems of the country. The conservation of food and of fuel demanded of Congress the Food Administration and the Fuel Administration, and public suffering was avoided by appropriate legislation along these lines.

One of the great operations of the Government under congressional legislation was the building of a great merchant marine to supply the loss from the ravages of the U-boats. The construction work was on a vast scale, and in no war work was governmental energy so conspicuously displayed. Every one who visited the great shipyards during their maximum development was thrilled by the tremendous energy everywhere visible.

Congress enacted laws for compensation to the disabled soldier, to the dependents of those who died in the service of their country, and provided for allotments and allowances to the dependents of the men in the service, for insurance of those in the service, for vocational training, and, finally, for the return to civil work of the discharged soldier, so that he should not go home penniless, and these laws in themselves constitute a code.

Legislation of the gravest importance is now pending before appropriate committees, providing for the payment of a bonus or otherwise making adequate compensation to all who entered the military service. These propositions are now receiving careful and considerate investigation, so that the Government may be generous to the defenders of the country within the capacity of the country's resources.

It is impossible to narrate all the important laws under the operation of which 4,000,000 men were mobilized in such fashion as to cause the least possible injury to industry; were armed and equipped with every weapon of modern warfare, fed, clothed, trained, and 2,000,000 of them transported across the sea, where by their unconquerable valor they turned threatened allied disaster into a great American victory.

Besides these measures, more or less dealing with war conditions, good-roads construction has received attention. I call attention to the bill by which surplus war material has been turned over to the State highway authorities of the several States, and I greatly appreciate the following letter from the State highway commissioner in regard to my efforts therein:

Hon. H. F. BYRD,
Winchester, Va.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am just in receipt of yours of the 22d instant, asking with reference to the distribution by the Government of war materials to the various States. This has been done through the Department of Agriculture in Washington in connection with the Federal aid act. Considerable delay, however, has been occasioned by the unwillingness on the part of the War Department to declare machinery or materials which could be used in highway construction or maintenance as surplus. It was therefore necessary for the highway officials of the United States to try to get through Congress legislation which would clear up the situation.

As chairman of the executive committee of the Highway Officials' Association, I took more or less active part in this work, and, by the way, I found your Congressman, Hon. T. W. HARRISON, most active in his willingness to assist us in these matters, and I feel that it is only fair that I should say to you that I feel the State of Virginia, and, as a matter of fact, all the other States, owe to him the legislation which has just been enacted by the Congress. Judge Harrison's position on the Military Affairs Committee placed him in a particularly advantagous position to bring about results.

This legislation, we believe, materially clears up the situation and will enable the States to procure road materials which will be of inestimable value to us in carrying forward our highway programs. The greater part of this machinery will be used in connection with the State and Federal construction and maintenance.

Trusting that this will give you all the information asked for, I am,
Very truly, yours,

G. P. COLEMAN,
State Highway Commissioner.

But this House has not fairly treated the agricultural interests. Under the guise of economy it has made injudicious cuts in appropriations of great importance to the farmer, and this in the face of earnest protests by Democratic Members who more especially represent agricultural interests. The fight is being carried to the Senate.

The great strain under which the Members of Congress have worked in the last three years has taken a heavy toll of its Members. Many times has the flag on the Capitol floated at half-mast. Three of the Virginia delegation, of long and faithful service to their State and country, full of honors, amidst the tears of their people, have been laid to rest beneath the sod of their native State.

During this period Congress, in obedience to an overwhelming mandate of the people, proposed by over a two-thirds vote the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, providing for national prohibition, which was ratified by 44 of the 48 States of the Union. I was elected to Congress in the first instance on this direct issue for national prohibition, and I would have been untrue to every pledge had I voted otherwise. Virginia was one of the first States to ratify.

This Congress has enacted the Volstead Act to enforce the provisions of the eighteenth amendment. The Republican Party alone is responsible for such imperfections as are found in this act, as at the time of the passage of the Volstead Act the Republicans were in control of both Houses of Congress.

The Volstead Act contains many imperfections and shortcomings, and I favored amendments to it, which were not accepted. When it came up in the House it had passed the stage of amendment, and the question then was whether it should be accepted or rejected as written. To vote to reject the bill meant that I was not in favor of enforcing the eighteenth amendment. To vote to accept the bill still leaves it open at the proper time to make such corrections as experience under it shows proper.

The drastic features of the bill have been grossly exaggerated, as it is not nearly so drastic as the Virginia State law.

The veto of the President was directed solely to that portion of the Volstead Act which related to the war-time prohibition. At the time the vote was taken in the House this feature of the Volstead Act had become immaterial. War-time prohibition, with or without the Volstead Act, continued until peace was declared and terminated, with or without the Volstead Act, when peace was proclaimed. On January 17 constitutional prohibition became operative and war-time prohibition ended.

The President had recommended a repeal of war-time prohibition, but Congress refused to act on his suggestion, and he could not, therefore, consistently sign the Volstead Act with this provision in it. As he had no fault to find with the other provisions of the bill, and after January 17 the vetoed provision passed out, my vote was in entire accord with the veto message of the President. I may add that my position on the Volstead Act was also in entire accord with the Democratic members of the Virginia delegation, including the late Senator Martin.

A certain slogan has gone forth in favor of "beer and light wines"; but it is difficult to understand what this comprehends. If it means nonintoxicating beer and light wines, then the Volstead Act does not interfere with such traffic. If it means intoxicating beer and light wines, then the traffic necessarily involves the return of places of sale and distribution. But no act of Congress can authorize the sale of intoxicating beverages, and the promise of a return to the traffic in such drinks is false and delusive.

An impression exists in some quarters that Congress may by definition of the amount of alcohol authorize traffic in intoxicating drink. This would permit Congress by mere definition to set aside a constitutional provision, which to any open mind obviously can not be. The Supreme Court has held that Congress may forbid the sale of liquor, even though the amount of alcohol is far below the intoxicating point, but the court has never held, nor is it within the range of possibility for the court to hold, that Congress may define intoxicating drink and authorize an amount of alcohol which would set aside the constitutional provision. Congress can limit the amount of alcohol below the intoxicating point, as a part of the necessary measures to suppress the traffic in intoxicating drink, but this is the very antithesis of authorizing an amount of alcohol in drink which produces intoxication.

Absurd ideas are scintillated about the effect of the Volstead Act as to traffic in liquids which have alcohol therein but which are not used as beverages. It has been stated in public places that traffic in vinegar is forbidden. This is wholly false. The Volstead Act applies only to malt, vinous, and fermented liquors for use for beverage purposes.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House embodies the latent hope of everyone and that is a return to official peace and to normal conditions, but a resolution can not bring about that which does not exist. In order to obtain official peace the war must terminate according to the regular and prescribed method. The Constitution prescribes the method and that must be followed. Nor can one nation make peace with its belligerents by its independent action, and a declaration of this kind simply leaves this country with its hands tied in dealing with Germany, and in the attitude of abandoning her allies. I can not therefore vote for it.

Never were conditions in this country and in the world generally so abnormal. The aftermath of war has left us problems to solve almost as menacing as faced this country in time of war. Stern and unflinching adherence to principle, conscientious devotion to duty, is demanded of all who have their country's good at heart. Instead of partisanship at this time, all conservative men should stand shoulder to shoulder in the great work of restoration. Instead of division on matters of minor importance, there should be unity of purpose on the part of every true American to keep the country free of the dangers now casting their shadows on her destiny.

Mr. PORTER. I hope the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] can use some of his time.

Mr. FLOOD. I think there will be only one more speech on this side.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "Vote!" "Vote!"

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to most of the speeches made in opposition to this resolution, and my feelings have been a combination of amusement and sympathy—amusement at the gyrations of some of my distinguished friends to get themselves in line, and sympathy with the dilemma in which they find themselves. The general inadequacy of their arguments shows that it is difficult even for the most astute to defend the indefensible.

Constitutional lawyers have sprung up overnight upon that side of the aisle, and from their arguments it would seem rather evident that they have confined their study of the Constitution to overnight. [Laughter.] In fact, some have displayed that quality of statesmanship which spells America with a little "a" and constitution with a "k." [Laughter.]

It has been 17 long, weary months now since the American people were electrified by the news that the enemy had laid down their arms and that hostilities had ceased. They heard that the Kaiser, the archfoe of civilization, was fleeing from his country with his precious progeny, and they rejoiced that peace was at hand. Not for one moment did they contemplate the possibility that a year and a half could elapse and a state of war still continue to exist. Yet to-day, though our Army is disbanded and our Navy reduced to a peace footing, all the war powers of the Executive continue in full force and vigor. Trade and commerce are out of joint. War boards and war commissions flourish, and thousands upon thousands of useless employees and chair warmers abound in the land. Under all the rules of international law we are to-day as much at war as when our guns were thundering in the Argonne, and it is time that this abnormal and anomalous condition should cease. And so far as it lies in the power of Congress to do it, we propose here and now to see that it shall cease. [Applause.]

The people of this country want peace. They are entitled to its fruits. They expected it, and had every right to expect it months ago, and it was beyond their reckoning that it would be so long withheld from them by one man, no matter how stubborn, and armed with no matter how great power and authority. [Applause.] But there has been, and is now, one insurmountable obstacle in our path toward peace, and that obstacle is the President of the United States. [Applause.] More than a year ago the treaty of peace would have been negotiated and ratified had he not forced the inclusion, in a manner and form inseparable from the rest of the document, as he has frequently boasted, of the child of his brain, that un-American monstrosity known as the Wilson League of Nations. [Applause.] It still remains, though twice repudiated, an integral part of the treaty, and in the exact phraseology bargained for and brought back by the President. From the beginning he has insisted, and still insists, that there shall be no peace unless that document as originally conceived and drafted by him shall be kept intact, and in so far as the peace negotiations were concerned he was successful.

As he embarked on the shores of France from the imperial yacht, the George Washington—heaven save the mark—he was acclaimed and hailed as a sort of demigod; and small wonder, for had not the American forces clinched the victory and was he not the titular head of the American Nation? The manner in which the people of Europe bade him farewell upon his return from his second voyage overseas is a different story, and one over which it is as well to draw the veil.

As we look back upon the days of the conference of Versailles, the general misconception of the people of Europe as to the precise nature of the credentials brought by President Wilson from the American people seems little short of extraordinary. Few apparently realized that under our form of government he had at best only half the treaty-making power. It seemed to be assumed also—and this assumption was by no means discouraged on the part of the Executive by permitting the truth to be dispatched over the cables—that he came fortified with and possessed of the confidence of at least a majority of the American people. It was known that Clemenceau had previously gone to the country and received an overwhelming vote of confidence, and that Lloyd-George, Orlando, and other dominant figures of the conference had done likewise. It was never suspected, apparently, certainly the President never encouraged the suspicion, that he had gone to the country in the only way possible under our Constitution, namely, in a campaign, urging the people to elect a Congress in control of his own partisans, and that he had been overwhelmingly repudiated at the polls. [Applause.]

And so the people of Europe, ignorant of the true conditions, hailed him and glorified him as a conquering hero. He walked with Kings and lost the common touch. Voices in the air whispered to him that honors greater even than the Presidency of the United States lay within his grasp, and he invented the League of Nations, of which he was to be president. Beguiled by the subtle flattery of sovereigns and the councilors of Versailles, he floated in an atmosphere of rosy dreams of power and glory, and soon began to forget his real constituents—the American people—and to barter away their interests for the consummation of his personal ambition. The old foxes about the peace table, trained in the traditions and skilled in the methods of European and Oriental diplomacy, saw in the League of Nations, which to them meant little or nothing, a splendid pivotal bargaining point, and for every inch they yielded during the negotiations in what to them were nonessentials they exacted and received an ell in essentials.

I had hoped to have time to quote rather elaborately from the work of a distinguished author on the subject of the peace conference, but I can read just one sentence from a book written by Mr. Keynes, who was the representative of the British treasury at that conference:

> Clemenceau had been clever enough to let it be seen that he would swallow the league at a price.

That is precisely what happened, and the price was paid by the American people.

And so the league was bought and paid for at the expense of the American people, and the President returned to display his wares to his almost forgotten constituents. To his immense surprise they balked at the bargain. He did not realize that they had had an opportunity to inspect and dissect the document, and had not been slow to conclude that instead of being a means to prevent war it was directly provocative of war and meant an involvement of America in controversies in which she had no possible interest or concern. He found that effective opposition had developed in the coordinate branch of the treaty-making power and had spread throughout the land. Deeply incensed at the course of events and unmindful of his most recent experience he again confidently took his cause to the people.

Reverse after reverse met his efforts. His auditors were respectfully unconvinced of his arguments and his persuasive eloquence fell upon dull ears. Furious at his failure, he raged at his opponents and coined epithets to fling at their devoted heads; but the more he raged the stronger grew the opposition, until finally one day during a paroxysm of fury something snapped, and he returned to Washington a broken man.

Unfortunately for himself the President had made a cardinal and vital mistake in his judgment of the temper of the American people. His specious doctrine of internationalism, which from the time of his declaration of the policy of watchful waiting he had been endeavoring with honeyed phrases to instill into their minds, had made but little impression. He had found that the doctrines of Washington and Hamilton and Jefferson and the other great constructive statesmen were by no means forgotten. He had discovered that the spirit of seventy-six still dwelt untarnished in the souls of the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is no historical instance with which I am familiar of a misjudgment of public sentiment so complete; but it may prove to be not without value to posterity if it shall teach to future Presidents that complete isolation from the everyday citizen, if proper for a sovereign like the Mikado of Japan, does not comport with the institutions of a great democratic Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.] It will prove of supreme value, in my estimation, if it shall teach the lesson that the proper place during his term of office for the President of the United States is in the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

What particularly concerns us to-day is the fact that peace without action by Congress is impossible so long as President Wilson remains in office. Though his following in the Senate has diminished to a mere handful his influence has twice proved effective to block all efforts to ratify the treaty of Versailles. So long as he insists that his League of Nations must remain intact in the treaty so long will ratification be unattainable, for there will be always enough patriots in the Senate who will not accept it under any circumstance or else only when so hedged about with reservations as will make it an American document and preserve the interests of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

For 17 months the Wilson League of Nations has stood between us and peace. To some Members of the coordinate branch of the treaty-making power it seemed so obnoxious to every canon of American institutions as to be unacceptable under any circumstances. To a larger group it has seemed possible in the interests of the procurement of peace to so hedge the document about with reservations as to enable us to participate in it without denationalizing ourselves. Both of these groups stand for the preservation of American rights. They decline to permit this Nation to participate in any covenant which will take from the American people that primary attribute of sovereignty, the right to determine who shall and who shall not be admitted to our shores, later perhaps to enjoy the privileges of citizenship. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They refuse to permit the denaturing of the Monroe doctrine. Above all, they resolutely refuse to bind this Nation to a covenant under which we would be compelled at the behest of some supergovernment to conscript our young men and send them to the uttermost ends of the earth to fight battles in which they have no concern and in which the interests and the honor of the United States are in no way involved. [Applause on the Republican side.] These constitue the American group.

There is still another, which we may for convenience style the international group. Not great in numbers but all-sufficient under existing conditions to prevent the ratifying of any treaty which does not include the Wilson League of Nations in exactly the form he wishes it. They have stood impervious to all arguments save one—"Unacceptable, W. W." And that fact was admitted on the floor of this House only a few moments ago by the distinguished Democratic leader, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], who stated that the President "controlled," to use his own words, more than 20 Democratic Senators. Their stubborn and successful fight to maintain war throughout all these months might be aptly eulogized in such lines as these:

Their's not to make reply,
Their's not to reason why,
Their's to vote "Nay" or "Aye"
As the boss ordered.

[Laughter and applause on Republican side.]

We have arrived at an impasse. The question simply is, Shall we, the chosen Representatives of 110,000,000 of people, sit supine and permit the will of a vast majority to be thwarted by the will of one man, elevated to office originally by a minority and since then repudiated by a great majority? The American people want peace and nine-tenths of them want it now. They are wearied to death of the interminable and futile debates in another body and they know that this resolution affords the only possible way to obtain peace. Gentlemen can not shirk their responsibility by quibbling over legal technicalities. The Constitution of the United States was intended to make effective the will of the people, not to stifle it. Whenever it has been invoked for the latter purpose the courts have intervened. Can it be that the statesmen who wrote the Constitution were so utterly lacking in vision that they devised an instrument under which an insignificant minority can keep this country indefinitely at war when all actual hostilities have ceased and can not be reopened? Is it possible that after a victory nobly won, with the enemy crushed and impotent to renew the conflict, we must forever wait upon the whim of one man before we may return to the normal paths of industrial activity? Must we continue indefinitely to endure the vastly expensive war commissions and boards which cramp and fetter the production of our farms, mines, and factories? Can it be that we, the legislative branch of the Government, are compelled by the Constitution to lodge indefinitely in the hands of the Executive powers which it was never contemplated should be exercised except when our armies were actually in the field? Is there no way by which Congress can terminate what amounts to martial law in this country? To admit that we are without recourse in this emergency is to admit that the Constitution is inadequate to protect our liberties and that our form of government is a failure. If such a preposterous proposition be true, then there is no longer any balance between the legislative and executive branches of the Government. The Executive is supreme and Congress is subordinate. I am loath to admit, but I fear it is true, that Congress stands none too high to-day in the estimation of the people of the United States. Doubtless this is partly due to the insensate greed of the Executive for power, but in my opinion we ourselves are mainly responsible because of our yielding on many occasions when we should have stood firm. An opportunity now offers—no better will ever come in our time—to play a man's part and thereby restore our lost prestige. I repeat, the American people want peace and they want it now. Shall we quibble about technicalities and whine about a possible veto from him who must be obeyed and then finish by doing nothing? Then, indeed, we shall deserve the contempt of the people and a seat in this House will carry with it diminished honor in the years to come.

Congress had and exercised the power to declare that a state of war existed between this country and Germany. Nearly a year and a half ago Germany laid down her arms and her navy passed out of existence. Our Army has disbanded and our Navy has been reduced to a peace footing. Under such circumstances it is mere quibbling to deny that Congress has the power to declare that a state of war has ceased to exist. Under any reasonable interpretation of the Constitution we have that power and by its exercise we may determine the date at which the state of war terminates. That is what is done by this resolution. Under it we also undertake to prescribe the conditions under which Germany may resume and enjoy complete trade relations with us. To assert that this is an exercise of the treaty-making power is pure equivocation and a mighty feeble excuse for avoiding responsibility.

This resolution is designed to meet a situation for which there is no other remedy. Without action by this House no peace is possible except by the sacrifice of principles that millions have fought to preserve and that of all Presidents Woodrow Wilson has been the first to abandon. Holding a club over a requisite number of Senators he has prevented action and will prevent during the remainder of his term of office the ratification in the ordinary manner of any treaty which does not contain as its very essence and heart a covenant which 90 per cent of the people resent as un-American. For nearly a year and a half they have been patient, but patience has ceased to be a virtue. They turn to us as a last resort for the relief which this administration has denied them.

To me our duty seems so clear and manifest that it amazes me that you gentlemen of the Democratic Party should make it a matter of partisan politics. When you were in the majority we upon this side did everything in our power to assist you in winning the victory. Yet now that we are in the majority you do everything in your power to prevent our bringing to the American people the full enjoyment of the fruits of victory. You know—who does not?—that we are proposing the only possible method of bringing about peace. Yet you are doing all you can to thwart us. You suggest no remedy, yet you repudiate the only one available.

We wish that we could have had your help to pass this resolution, but we can and will accomplish our purpose without it. We in this House have a double duty to perform—a duty to ourselves and a duty to the people. By our action to-day we will demonstrate that the House of Representatives has ceased to be the legislative amanuensis of the Executive, that we have again become at least a coordinate branch of the Government. We will demonstrate, too, that when the manifest will of the many is being thwarted by the will of the few there is at least one political party of sufficient constructive ability to see to it that the will of the majority is made effective. Before we adjourn to-night we shall have paved the way to peace, an American peace, a peace of which Washington, or Jefferson, or Lincoln, or Roosevelt would not have been ashamed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS].

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, there is apparently one accord here to-day that a state of peace actually exists, and that it is vitally important to the commercial and industrial welfare of the country and to its general tranquillity that the fact of peace be given official expression. The war with Germany ended nearly a year and a half ago. Our Army and Navy have been demobilized to peace status, and our young men have long since laid aside their uniforms and returned to the pursuits of peace. We are even trading with our late enemies, and the technical state of war we are maintaining is of no consequence to other countries, with effects only internal. The President, too, so recognizes, for he has vetoed legislation founded, as he stated, on war, and which was not justified by the existing peace, and in numerous Executive communications he has affirmed that the war closed in November, 1918. This fact is so palpable that even for convenience in argument no one in the course of this discussion has thought to question it, and yet because the President blocks every avenue to formal peace, except through the League of Nations, this farce of war is to be continued indefinitely.

When the Congress declared war against Germany the President and the Congress said it was because our rights and welfare had been assailed, our citizens and interests attacked, and that we were going to war to vindicate our rights and eliminate from the world the menace of military autocracy. There was no other purpose whatever assigned or understood by the Congress and people, and therefore when these purposes were accomplished our task was done and an immediate peace should have been concluded with Germany that would have vindicated our rights, assured us against future attack and of the permanence of our victory, but as the war progressed the President gave evidence that he had other purposes in view than those expressed in the declaration of war. It was of no consequence that he declared that the object of the war was to make the world safe for democracy, for no one believed it then or believes it now; but when, as the war was drawing to a close, he gave it another meaning of his own creation and he heard voices in the air mandating him to deliver the country to a superior sovereignty, his vision became serious and alarming and the national voice, the material voice of myriads of patriotic men whose feet were on the earth, was heard at the polls in vehement mandate to the Congress, and especially to the Senate, to protect and save the country. But even after this, with astonishing persistency in the mandate which he alone was able to hear, he insisted to the world that it rang so clear, so imperative, that he enmesh his country in a supergovernment—of which, of course and incidently, the same voice whispered he should be the first ruler—that he was left no discretion, but reduced to a mere scrivener to write the instrument of assignment; and yet there is evidence that discomforting doubts came to him and that more and more his confidence became shaken in his inspiration, and that finally he came to distrust and at last lose confidence altogether in his ethereal mandate. Had he remained confident that he was but the utterance of a high authority, certain and definite in a distinct and determined purpose, he would not have hazarded his high commission by complicating its execution with an extrinsic or foreign subject, but would have brought back a League of Nations covenant in perfect purity, untrammeled by the terms of peace with Germany, respecting which he had no mandate and the approval of which there was no certainty. No matter with what distrust or suspicion his manner of executing the league covenant cast upon his sincerity, what appearance it gives of pretense and good faith, or what intense indignation it may stir, we must refrain from free expression, for, after all, Mr. Wilson is the President of the United States. But on the authority of Mr. Wilson himself we are privileged to say that he was so determined to merge the United States with a superstate, to subordinate it to a foreign sovereignty, and to preclude the American people from free consideration and expression in the matter that he purposely and deliberately resorted to the device of interweaving the League of Nations with the treaty of peace with Germany. As he himself has declared in a speech which he delivered in New York on March 4, 1919, when he said:

> And when that treaty comes back gentlemen on this side will find the covenant not only in it, but so many threads of the treaty tied to the covenant, that you can not dissect the covenant from the treaty without destroying the whole vital structure. The structure of peace will not be vital without the League of Nations, and no man is going to bring back a cadaver with him.

Such unprecedented methods have been employed to accomplish a purpose by men who were less distinguished and who were not looked upon as the epitome of the honor of this great Nation. The President appointed himself plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty with countries with which we have not been at war on a proposition and in consummation of a policy absolutely foreign, independent, and distinct from the cause of our war with Germany, and then not only attempted to deprive the people of free consideration and judgment in the matter by complicating it with the treaty of peace, but he attempted to coerce them into ratifying it by holding the distress of war over them until they should submit to his will. After intertwining the league covenant with the treaty of peace, he said to the Senate of the United States and to the country, "If you want peace, yield to my will. It is this treaty with the covenant rider or no treaty. Take it in this form or leave it. Take this in its entirety or you shall have nothing. Accept this covenant or I shall continue the infliction upon the country of war."

So far as the actual terms of the treaty of peace with Germany are concerned, there is no difficulty. They are acceptable to America and in instances Germany has already agreed to them. Then, in fact, the war is at an end and even the written terms of peace are agreed upon, but as a state of war gives to the President a leverage in his efforts to force the League of Nations on this country, he will not permit a restoration of peace. The same instrument which he handed to conquered Germany with the command, "Sign here or war shall be continued," is now presented to victorious America with this same imperialistic command, with the same threat, and, what is more, his supporters insist that this sovereign country has no alternative but to accept. While, of course, conceding that the Congress alone is vested with the prerogative to declare war, the President and his supporters contend it has no power of initiative in restoring peace; that until the President moves affirmatively and in written terms, the war must continue; and hence, logically, should the President fail or refuse to act at all, such inaction would preclude the possibility of peace. There is no other construction to be given to the President's speeches and letters or the argument of his supporters. To these gentlemen and for their convenience, the Constitution closes every avenue to peace. Because of it we can not follow precedent in our own history or that of nations, or act under the high authority of international law. All of their arguments in construing the means of peace bring us back and confine us to the one solitary method—that of ratifying the league covenant, and this, too, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

It is mere dictum, I know, but patent and fully sustained, that the proponents of the league covenant have but one interest and but one purpose in the long, protracted struggle for peace which has been going on, and that is to force this country into the League of Nations.

While it is recognized that the House is without voice in the creation of international treaties, yet the situation has made the obligations, expediency, and consequences to America of her entering a League of Nations the text of all speeches on the pending resolution.

The constitutional authority and other means of establishing peace have been so exhaustively discussed that seemingly nothing more can be said without mere repetition, and therefore, as the treaty and league covenant are questions of the gravest importance and consequence to the House of Representatives per se and as the most immediate representative in government of the people, it may be well to consider for a moment the relation of the House to the treaty, which to my notice has not been referred to.

Should this treaty be ratified it would undoubtedly wrest from the House its highest and most sacred constitutional authority of declaring war and judgment in making appropriations of public money for many international uses, and it would vest this authority in the superstate. The Constitution provides that a treaty made by the President and the Senate "shall be the supreme law of the land," and therefore should this treaty be ratified the House would be as subject to its mandates and inhibitions as it is to the Constitution, of which the treaty would become a part, and hence the House would be legally and morally bound to perform all the requirements that would be necessary to the execution of the terms of the treaty. The obligation of the House to obey and carry out the engagements of treaties was considered and confirmed by the House of Representatives as early as 1796, with the cordial concurrence of Washington. The Jay treaty could not be executed without an appropriation of public money, and, as under the Constitution such appropriation must orignate in the House, the question was whether the House was under compulsion by the requirements arising from the treaty to vote an appropriation when the House did not approve of the treaty. In 1835 the House again acknowledged the compelling power of a treaty by making important changes in our tariff laws because an international treaty had pledged to do so. During President Jackson's administration our Government protested against the action of the French Chamber in refusing to vote an appropriation for an indemnity which the King in a treaty had promised to pay. There is one resolution of the House of Representatives holding to the contrary of this principle, but from a study of it and of the circumstances inducing its passage, it will be seen, I think, that this resolution is not authoritative. Then applying this provision of the Constitution and the compulsion of the House to obey it to a hypothetical situation, which is sure to become actual under the operation of the League of Nations, there is no disagreement with the contention of the President that the league covenant establishes a superstate, endowed with authority to compel obedience to its edicts. One of the superstate's most distinctive powers is to maintain the boundaries and territorial integrity of such subordinate or signatory nations as it may recognize, and another that it may levy upon nations for men and means to enforce its judgments and decrees. There could be no dispute as to these provisions of the covenant without the Senate's reservations.

The league has created and is covenanted to maintain the national integrity of Poland, which country in mere ambition is to-day at war extending her national boundaries. She must be upheld or restrained, as the league may conclude, which, of course, implies force in either event—either against Russia to enforce the ambitions of Poland, or with Russia to compel Poland to withdraw within her own confines, as fixed by the superstate. It would be sheer nonsense to contend that while the league has the duty to establish national boundaries, it has no power to draw upon the man power and resources of its signatories to enforce its authority. Mr. Wilson himself so contends in saying that the Senate reservations to article 10 of the treaty takes the life out of the covenant by depriving the league of authority to draw upon the United States in the conduct of wars it is waging without a declaration of war by Congress. Then by virtue of the Constitution, the treaty having become a part of the "supreme law of the land," the House has no option in the matter, but is under compulsion to tax our people and appropriate public money in any amount which the league would apportion the United States as her part of the cost of establishing by force of arms the boundary line between Poland and Russia. But the case of Poland is only a mere instance.

The city of Fiume is already in open revolt against the league and but the other day sent a statement to Sir Eric Drummond, secretary of the league, that the league was attempting to deprive Fiume of her rights and sovereignty; "that the pseudo League of Nations is nothing more in reality than an instrument by which the British Empire and other capitalistic States serve themselves by insuring the hegemony of the rest of the world."

There was much more in this communication, but enough has been given to show that Fiume is already in revolt against her master and that certainly the league must soon send a fleet and an army there to restore obedience, and here, too, were the United States in the league, the House would have no choice in the matter, but would be compelled to levy a tax and make appropriations to carry out our national obligations under the treaty and thus support this war.

Roumania is likewise in open revolt, for, as she contends, while her territorial dominion has been extended, the league has deprived her of her sovereignty and she is even threatening to withdraw from the league by force of arms. Of course, here also could be a necessity of the superstate making requisition upon our public funds.

Nations are at swords points as to which of them shall have the rich Provinces which have been wrested from Turkey, Egypt, India, Albania, even Greece, and a large part of Italy, and, in fact, it is difficult to name a country other than Japan, France, England, and the United States that at this time is not either at war or whose peoples are not in open insurrection in whole or in part, while the general unrest in the countries I have excepted is well and generally known.

Mr. Wilson in the name of peace would plunge the United States into this world riot and orgies of war in fetters. The House would be helpless to guard and protect the National Treasury and would become a mere automaton in the hands of the League of Nations to vote such taxes on our people and make such appropriations of money as the superstate would at pleasure command. But let us turn from war to glance at the cost to the United States of the operation of the league when the world is at peace; when turbulent Europe is meek and submissive, and when we would not be required to support armies and maintain wars, but would only be required to contribute our part to the cost of maintaining civil government in Europe under the league. As now required, to say nothing of what further and later may be demanded, we are to participate in the commissions created to supervise affairs in Belgium, Saar Basin, Czecho-Slovak State, Poland, free city of Danzig, and Schleswig boundary. We are in like manner participants in the Saar Basin government commission. We are to participate in plebiscite commissions of Poland, Schleswig, and East Prussia, and the interallied military, naval, and aeronautical commissions of control, charged with the enforcement of the disarmament provisions of the treaty. We are to have our arbiters to determine the amount of river craft that shall go to France on the Rhine and to the allied and associated powers on the Elba, the Oder, the Nieman, and the Danube, and to determine the conditions under which the international convention relative to the St. Gothard Railway may be denounced. Finally, we are one of the four powers whose representatives are to sit as a representative commission to assess damages against Germany, to appraise credits, to judge of her economic requirements as affecting her ability to furnish certain raw material, to pass on her tax system, to postpone payment of her debts, to prescribe the conditions of her bonds, to recommend abatement of her debt, to appraise the value of public property in ceded territories, and a great bulk of other duties, all of which may make or break the peace of Europe by an obligation on our part that having so participated in the breaking we shall once more contribute our millions of men and our billions of dollars to the readjustments. Imagination can hardly outstrip reality as to the cost of carrying on even orderly civil government in Europe, and yet the House could only in effect make appropriations when and in amounts as ordered by the league.

The civil pay roll alone would be enormous. But our participation in civil government might prove interesting, and in this we could have some compensation for our outlay.

It is probable that party lines in America would be drawn on the policies to be pursued in administering the multitudinous affairs of Europe referred to, for if our people are interested to the extent of going deep into their pockets, they certainly will want to know what they are getting for their money. They will want an understanding and a voice through Representatives in Congress of what is going on over there in Europe, what policies are being pursued, and how these trusts are being administered. If possible, they should not divide on policies; they certainly would on spoils and plunder, for there would be rich picking. It would be only the army of clerks that would be under the civil service, and hence nonpartisan, while there are innumerable high commissioners to be named by the party in power. Of course, no man of ordinary ability could fill these high stations of great responsibility, and, of course, salaries and expenses, it is no exaggeration to say, running into the millions would have to be in keeping with the high statesmanship required. Were the amount of salaries of commissioners and clerks and the amount of other expenses to be left to the House, these might give some perplexity, and some money might be saved, but undoubtedly the superstate would fix salaries, figure the general budget, and pass it to the House with an order to pay it.

We who so long have been accustomed to considering the propriety and the amounts and objects of appropriations asked out of public funds are naturally slow to comprehend that with going into the league we would surrender these options and that the demands of the League of Nations would be supreme.

Out of all of the pessimism and gloom which shrouds the league covenant, the brilliant vision to office seekers of public pap looms in relief. But even this is not without a cloud, for Mr. Wilson might conclude to reward the worthy syndicated patriots who assisted him in putting the League of Nations across—such men, for instance, as ex-President Taft and Attorney General Wickersham and many of such high-priced international lawyers; the personnel of the league to enforce peace en bloc; some of the international brokers, who hold large speculative investments in promises to pay of pauper nations, in the financial and physical integrity of which they are, of course, financially interested; and possibly the editors of some of the metropolitan newspapers, who seem to have no country and no object but to serve great interests. Of course, such men would come high, and their expense accounts would hardly be less than some of the dollar-a-year patriots who served in Washington during the war and rendered an expense account of $6,000 per year. I am not attempting irony in presenting this aspect, for it is real and serious. The fact is the United States would be a packhorse of burdens which the treaty would put upon it in the matter of civil government alone, which is the least burdensome prospect of the League of Nations.

It may be that it will require actual sober experience to impress these facts upon our people, but it well may be at least surmised that eventually when our people settle down to the consideration of the dollars and cents to them which the League of Nations means and of the House having to vote enormous appropriations year after year, obedient to orders from Europe, in order to support foreign civil governments or to keep people some three to six thousand miles away from fighting and killing each other, that at taxpaying time and when soberly considering the high cost of living, they will lose interest in the poetry of the league and wish that Europe could attend to her own business and bear her own burdens; but let us remember that once in the league our people will be helpless to stop payments or to withdraw, for the league covenant provides for perpetuity of its existence and affords no means for the United States to withdraw until the signatory powers say we have discharged all of our obligations. And certain it is, with Europe the judge as to when we have discharged our obligations, we would have to pay dearly for the privilege we had exercised. To refuse to keep up payments would be in violation of the constitution of the league and of our own Constitution, and nothing could be more revolutionary in character, and it would unquestionably precipitate an immediate war with the entire world against us.

I appeal to our people to turn their eyes for a moment from the deceptive and luring vision of peace with which they are being baited and look at the practical, financial, and homely side of this serious question.

I should refer to another matter before closing. There seems to be a scurrying to fix the responsibility or blame of defeating the treaty and league covenant upon some one or some group in the United States Senate. To me, as I understand the league covenant, after painstaking study, this is incomprehensible, for I consider the dangers of the covenant so serious and the surrender of our national sovereignty and individual liberty so certain that it appears to me that instead of trying to fix the blame for destroying the covenant we should identify the men or group upon which to confer the honor.

It is probable that because the President has said that the reservation to article 10 takes the life out of the treaty and because the great battle in the Senate has raged around this article that the public believes that by the adoption of the reservation the fangs of the covenant have been extracted and that all danger is past. Nothing could be further from the facts. The reservation, important as it is, merely preserves the present constitutional power of the Congress to declare war, any provision in the league covenant to the contrary notwithstanding. This with the other reservations materially Americanize the covenant, but the fabric itself of the covenant remains unimpaired and the reservations do not subtract from the great mass of its remaining provisions that are essential to confer upon the superstate its far-reaching powers. So far as the chief purposes of the league are concerned, our commitment to it and our moral and most of its legal obligations to and under it remain. The reservations preserve to the United States certain powers and the right to exercise its own judgment on matters the covenant took away from it and conferred upon the league. But notwithstanding this they leave us in the league as fully as provided in the original covenant. They do not destroy the basis of the league. We are still to participate as a member of the league in the affairs, political and financial, of the world generally and of other nations respectively. We are as a member to contract and assume great financial and other obligations and to take upon ourselves all of the grave responsibilities mentioned by the covenant and which may be hereafter assumed or undertaken by the league. With participation in the contracting of these vast obligations and responsibilities there goes necessarily the obligation to not only respect our own but to demand performance by other nations of reciprocal obligations. This means force, for there must be some existing power—moral, legal, or both—behind contracts, national or private, to assure their performance.

I have already discussed the constitutional character and mandatory power of our international treaties, and said in substance that when once in the league the superstate could command the United States to war to carry out its own purposes, and I have endeavored to make clear that the House of Representatives—or the Congress, for that matter—would be compelled to impose taxes to enable any appropriation that the superstate would require. There is no exception to these propositions, even considering the reservation which prevents the league from using our military forces at will; for, notwithstanding this reservation, the amended covenant, if ratified, would require the Congress both legally and morally to make such appropriations as the superstate called for to discharge engagements undertaken by and in operations of the treaty.

The principal allied foreign nations, international bankers, and investment brokers understand this perfectly and really care but little for the reservations, for through the league they would have and use the credit, wealth, and resources of the United States in, as they say, rehabilitating Europe. Every persuasive, alluring sophistry is being employed by these selfish interests; appeals in the name of peace and to the heart and conscience of the American people are being employed to inveigle our country into the league. England, France, and Italy have through their leading statesmen and official newspapers assured that the reservations were not material; that they would welcome the United States on practically any terms. It is not that these great national and private interests are devoted to the heart, soul, and conscience causes which they flaunt and which is the impelling consideration of good people in giving their indorsement to the league, but these organized financial interests are endeavoring by any and all means to shoulder upon this country the financial burdens of their own and of the world generally.

Every conceivable plan for involving the United States is already perfected or is being evolved to be set in operation through the league as soon as the United States can be persuaded into it. I wish it was possible for everyone who is studying the great economic problems growing out of the war to read especially the seventh chapter of Mr. John Maynard Keynes's book, entitled "The Economic Consequences of the Peace." Mr. Keynes is a great English statesman and financier, who represented the British treasury at the peace conference, and who in his book urges the necessity to the world of the United States canceling the debts owing to her by the European countries. The allied powers are openly agitating and advocating the proposition of the League of Nations reapportioning the total war debt of all countries and saddle upon the United States a material part of it. European influences have obtained the indorsement of the Secretary of the Treasury to so refund the English debt as to cause a loss to the United States in interest of nearly half a billion dollars. A great English banker and financier, Sir George Paish, has been in the United States within the last six weeks to obtain American support of a proposition that the British and American bankers shall create a reciprocal credit of a billion dollars as a revolving fund to be used by the League of Nations in stabilizing the credit of European countries and by which and without more detail both the money and the commodities purchased would remain in Europe—the operation to be financed by the War Finance Corporation and the Federal reserve bank.

America, solvent and prosperous, is the victim of machinations of every conceivable character of European nations and international brokers, and we must be vigilant and watchful or we will be brought to financial ruin.

The United States began its career in a state not of seclusion but at least of distinct independence from European politics, intrigue, and wars. Adherence to this policy has brought America to her estate of financial prosperity and moral influence, and the great destiny of our country is to be fulfilled by a faithful adherence to the same wise, prudent, and generous course.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RAMSEY.]

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. Speaker, the duties which devolve upon men in political and governmental life are such that they must be met without bias or personal prejudice, but fearlessly, conscientiously, and truthfully. The obligations of such persons are always of lesser or greater importance, and the greater the responsibility to act and to perform the graver is the subject matter and the more essential is it that one should act right and in accordance with his honest convictions. Three years ago we were here considering with great solemnity, earnestness, and feelings of apprehension a resolution declaring that by reason of the unlawful acts of the Imperial German Government to and toward our Government and individual rights a state of war had been thrust upon us, and then existed; and so upon its adoption by the Congress of the United States we entered upon the performance of the duty that such resolution necessarily obligated us to. I will not recite the activities of the war, our participation in it, nor the great emulation and commendation that our Republic and its true patriotic sons and adopted sons are entitled to for their efforts in bringing about an ultimate victory. This is history, is well known to us all, and will go down to posterity in its true light. On November 11, 1918, the armistice was signed, and on that day the President of the United States addressed the Congress, and after reciting other matters of interest, declared, "War thus comes to an end," which meant that Germany had been subdued.

Of course, such a statement by the President did not necessarily have the effect of really ending the war. But what are the indisputable facts? Germany and the Central Powers were conquered. There was immediately a cessation of hostilities. The German naval vessels and ships were either taken possession of or destroyed, its artillery was captured, and ever since, a period of about 17 months, there have been no hostilities and actual peace has existed. The usual method of establishing peace between belligerent nations is by treaty, and this was undertaken by our Government in consort with the allied powers. The treaty-making power under our form of government and as prescribed by the Constitution of the United States is a prerogative of the President in its negotiation and must be ratified by the Senate of the United States by a two-thirds vote before it can become effectual and operative. After months of consideration a treaty of peace was executed and afterwards submitted to the United States Senate by the President, but with it and interwoven in it was the League of Nations. This treaty with the League of Nations failed of ratification by the Senate and was rejected by it because in its provisions it was positively in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, destroyed our sovereignty as a Nation, and created a supergovernment, over which we had no control. It has been considered twice by the Senate and on each occasion failed of ratification and has been returned to the President, where it now is. The Senate, in the proper exercise of its constitutional rights and duties, desiring to safeguard American rights and preserve inviolate our Constitution, believed that an American Congress should retain the sole power of declaring war and that our young men should not be sent to foreign countries to fight the battles of other nations without our express direction as evidenced by congressional action. The reservations that were adopted by the Senate to the League of Nations were of a substantial character and of great value in preserving our rights, and with these accepted it might have been advisable for the Senate to have ratified it, for our people wanted peace, and now want peace.

Mr. Speaker, what is the character of this resolution and what will be the effect of its adoption? It is simply to declare that the state of war that existed or now exists between the Imperial German Government and the United States is at an end. The war is at an end, and has been for nearly a year and a half. This is patent to everybody, and the whole world knows it is so. The adoption of this resolution by Congress will legally declare a fact to exist, namely, that the war is at an end, and under its terms commercial relations with Germany will be resumed, a condition most desirable, and the great war powers given to the President by the various acts of Congress which were necessary during war times will be abrogated and become inoperative, as they should be, for there is no necessity for their further continuance. These powers are greater and more far-reaching in their character than any that have ever been bestowed upon a living man in any country. Should they be continued when we are not at war? I think not, and I am sure the people of this country think likewise.

Mr. Speaker, what is the objection urged against the adoption of this resolution? Only one, so far as I have been able to learn from the debate that has taken place to-day. My friends on the other side of the House urge that it usurps the powers and privileges of the President, and that it is unconstitutional; that peace can only be established by a treaty; that while the Congress only can declare war, it has no right to say in express and direct language that the war is at an end. Permit me to say that nowhere in the Constitution is there any inhibition against Congress doing just what this resolution seeks to accomplish. The authorities on international law all agree that there are three ways of terminating war between belligerent States: First, by a treaty of peace; second, by the conquest and subjugation of one of the belligerents by the other; third, by mere cessation of hostilities so long continued that it is evident that there is no intention of resuming them. We have tried the first method and failed. We now come to the third. Can anyone say that not sufficient time has elapsed since the cessation of hostilities—nearly a year and a half—not to warrant the conclusion that the war has terminated and that there is no intention of resuming hostilities? Besides, Germany has been divested of its war equipment, and, in fact, a new form of Government has been established by its people, and the Army of the United States has long since been entirely demobilized.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, let us be fair in this matter; let no man hide behind the untenable statement that our contemplated action is unconstitutional. Who is to question the constitutionality of this resolution?

Is there a patriotic American citizen or a group of American citizens who dare question our right by court proceedings to enact this law, even though it might be subject to attack, of which I am very much in doubt, and especially as to those provisions declaring the war at an end and the repeal of the extraordinary war-time powers of the President?

Mr. Speaker, has politics at last been interjected in this House in the consideration of war legislation? There was none when the resolution declaring that a state of war existed was passed; there was none when we considered and passed all the war-time bills. Shall there be politics now, when we seek to declare that the war is at an end? I hope not and that it will be so evidenced by the vote soon to be taken.

The people of the United States want this resolution adopted and made a law. It is incumbent on each and every one of us to give heed to their desires, as well as it is incumbent on us to examine ourselves and then, in obedience to a conclusion brought about by a fearless, conscientious, and truthful determination, declare our vote. May it be in the affirmative, for I truly believe that by so doing only will we be satisfied with ourselves and meet up to the expectations of our constituency and the people of our country.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY.]

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, when a peace resolution was first suggested it found a hearty response in my heart and I determined to support the same. I have spent every spare moment in the library since the committee filed this bill with a hope that I might find authority to support the bill, but the more I searched the more I became convinced that I was wrong. In fact, I have not been able to find a single authority to support this resolution. For two days I have been sitting in this Chamber, heard and read all arguments advanced by the proponents of this bill, but I have failed to find where anyone claims that Congress has the right to make a treaty. I say not one, and what seems passing strange is that not one would answer a single question, and all declined to yield because they "did not have time." Even the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], refused to answer a single question. How, then, can an honest inquiring mind satisfy the longing of a heart to support this resolution? I do not propose to discuss the constitutionality of this bill, for that has been fully covered by gentlemen who preceded me in this debate, but I want to call one matter to the attention of the House which has not been discussed. The First Congress attempted to do the very thing that this Congress now attempts to do. The first treaty which made us a Nation was the so-called Jay treaty with England, which seemingly was not very popular in this country.

The Jay treaty, after due ratification, was proclaimed by the President on February 29, 1796, and on the following day a copy of it was communicated to Congress for its information. An expenditure was necessarily involved in the organization of the mixed commissions providing for the various articles. The treaty met with disfavor in the House, and on March 24 a resolution was passed by which the President was requested to communicate to the House copies of the instructions to the negotiator and other documents relative to the treaty.

Fully appreciating the importance as a precedent of his reply to the request, President Washington called for the written opinions of the heads of the departments. He also wrote to Hamilton for his views. The heads of the departments were unanimous in denying the right of the House to insist on the request, and in asserting that the power to make the treaty rested with the President and Senate, and that treaties thus concluded were binding on all bodies of men within the jurisdiction of the United States.

President Washington, on March 30, replied as follows:

> It is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty. * * * The duty of my office forbids a compliance with your request. * * * I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject, which from the establishment of the Government until that time had been acquiesced in by the House, namely, that the power of making treaties was exclusively vested in the President and the Senate, and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward became the law of the land.

In replying to this message the House passed a resolution in which it declaimed an agency in the making of treaties—> * * * but it was the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives to deliberate on the inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect. (Crandall on Treaties, pp. 164–165.)

Thus it seems that President Washington and all those associated with him in the making of the Constitution, as well as those who interpreted it to the present day, were all of the opinion that Congress has no authority to make a treaty. In the treaty with Algiers the test came up again, and because of some doubt as to whether Congress would appropriate the money necessary to carry the treaty into effect Thomas Jefferson, who was then the Secretary of State, advised President Washington not to affix the seal until he knew that Congress would vote the money. The President asked whether, if such a treaty were ratified by and with the consent of the Senate, it would be valid under the Constitution and obligatory upon the Representatives to furnish the money. Jefferson replied that—

> It certainly would, and that it would be the duty of the Representatives to raise the money that they might do what was their duty. * * *

The President would not favor the precaution, and declared that if the Representatives—

> Did not do what the Constitution called on them to do the Government would be at an end and must then assume another form. (Crandall on Treaties, sec. 75.)

The framers of the Constitution were unanimous in their opinion that Congress should not be given a voice in making a treaty. (Madison Papers, 5 Elliot 131, Federalist No. 75.)

Here are the words as finally adopted and now appear in the Constitution:

He—

The President—

shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

The safety of our Republic depends upon the fidelity of her representatives to the Constitution. Our Constitution has lived longer than any ever written. Mr. Gladstone says that it is—

The most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man.

It rests the functions of our Government in three branches—executive, judicial, and legislative. But they tell us that the Senate and the President are at loggerheads and are unable to write a treaty, and that is justification sufficient to warrant us in violating our oaths to support the Constitution. Let us see. Would any of you advocate that Congress should usurp the power of the Supreme Court and interpret the laws that we pass because that branch has failed in their duty? Just recently the Supreme Court held that they could not find the Steel Trust guilty, even though it violated the Sherman antitrust law by unlawful combinations and compelled the consumer to pay dividends on $100,000,000 watered stock, because there was no evidence that the law was violated after the complaint was filed by the Government. In other words, the court held in principle that if a man committed murder he could not be convicted if he behaved himself while in the custody of the sheriff.

Not a single person here will approve that decision. All of us know that if that is to be the future course it will mean the end of this Republic, yet not one will advocate that we assume judicial duties. You will not even attempt to remedy that condition by requiring that judges should be appointed for a term of years instead of for life. History is surely repeating itself. My grandparents came to this country to escape the autocracy in Europe. They preferred to trust their children to the wild beast of the forest rather than continue to pay tribute to an autocracy. But behold how we pay tribute to the autocracy of combinations, and you fail to raise your voice in opposition, even though you find the chains already clanking to bind you into serfdom.

Yes, history repeats, and in more than one way. It was about a century ago when actions of the Senate were as selfish as their actions now appear to be. And what is the result of all this "holier-than-thou" action? After the South and Central American countries threw off the European yoke they asked for a conference under the Monroe doctrine, against the encroachment of the Holy Alliance in Europe, which insisted that these South American Republics should again become Spanish colonies. President Adams appointed two commissioners, but the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate refused to comply. However, the Senate, after years of debate, finally confirmed them, but not until one man had died and the other was unable to get there in time for the last meeting.

The South American Republics naturally concluded that our Monroe doctrine was a selfish doctrine, issued to keep European nations from colonizing the Western Hemisphere, but with no assurance that we would permit them self-determination. This action did not only alienate the friendship of these Republics but made them distrustful, resulting in a loss of confidence and trade. Even now it is proposed by these Latin American Republics to abandon the Pan American Union and to establish a court of arbitration for the Western Hemisphere wherein we have no voice. And now the action of our Senate in failing to ratify the peace treaty did not only give additional offense to these neighbor Republics but to all Europe as well.

All the belligerents signed the treaty of Versailles except China, and all have treaty relations again except this country and China. China has a real grievance, but she always will have until she is willing to make the necessary sacrifices to preserve her national life. Look at her hundreds of millions unable to drive out a handful of Japanese!

But let us dismiss those who advocate that the time is at hand when we are justified in violating our oath to preserve this country, for they only possess the mind reflecting hate and advocating brute force, just because they think themselves superior in that field. There are enough law-abiding men who will be against this class. Permit me for a moment to divert your attention to the specious arguments advanced by those proponents who show some respect for the Constitution which holds us together as a Nation. These gentlemen contend that this bill does not attempt to make a treaty. Let us see. Section 3 provides—

That unless with 45 days from the date when this resolution becomes effective the German Government shall duly notify the President of the United States that it has declared a termination of war * * * and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles.

Rather bungling expression, I will admit, but it only shows that the framers of this bill intended to confuse by the use of words. However, a close reading only means to impose on Germany the Versailles treaty without assuming any responsibility on our part. But since a treaty is an agreement between nations, just as a contract is between individuals, I fail to see how the treaty can become effective unless we, too, agree to sign the contract. But what happens if Germany will not accept the provisions of this bill? In that event we have section 4, which provides that if any person will trade with Germany that person shall be fined $10,000 or imprisoned, if a natural person, for two years. In other words, the bill imposes a fine of $10,000 or two years' imprisonment for any person in this country who should send money or provisions to their starving relations in Germany.

They tell us that this bill only declares a state of peace and provides for trade with Germany. We are at peace with Germany. Our armies have been withdrawn and the boys are at home. This resolution can not add anything. Again, as we are now trading with Germany, why impose a fine of $10,000 and two years' imprisonment on anyone in this country for trading with Germany? Why make Germany accept the Versailles treaty under threat of starvation when we will not be a party to that treaty? Gentlemen, you can not have peace on that basis. If we want to enter into a contract with Germany, let us be willing to sign that contract ourselves and not possess the spirit of the highwayman, who extracts the money from the traveler with pistol in hand. They tell us the people are weary of war measures and want them repealed. So they are. Then why do you not offer your resolution designating which ones you propose to repeal? Is it the food-control act and the espionage act that you desire to repeal? Then why not say so?

This bill does not repeal either the food-control act or the espionage act. On October 22, 1919, you extended the food-control act for two years, and it does not repeal the espionage act. Then why not be honest and say just what act you intend to repeal? I propose to vote for the repeal of the substitute which repeals all those war acts, which is more than this bill would do if enacted into law.

The fact is that the bill was conceived in hate and born in a murderous heart. Not one would vote for this bill if he knew it would become a law, but you are voting only to discredit the President. What else do these whispering, slanderous remarks mean? What else did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] intend when insinuating that the President is only feigning sickness? What else does the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD speak to our children in the debate on this resolution, when they read the following words spoken of the President, found on page 5266, "'That is when he got sick' [applause on the Republican side]"? Great God, have we fallen so low as to lose all sense of feeling? Can we laugh when we see men suffer for righteousness' sake? Can we applaud when we see them dying for the right as God has given them light to see that right? Would you applaud if word came that our Chief Executive had died?

History reveals that probably no Presidents were more slandered than Washington and Lincoln. To-day the most expensive monuments in our Capital have been erected to those two noble characters. If President Wilson has blazed his name into fame, you can not destroy it by slander. You may kill the body, but not the spirit. That, my friends, you will, after all, find the only enduring part of life.

Gentlemen, the day will come when your posterity will refuse to speak of this day because of shame. Even now you applaud in order to keep up your courage. Some day the world will understand the real meaning of all this. The people will not surrender their liberties so easily, and you can not fool them by this bastard resolution. The boys who fought at Belleau Woods and the Argonne Forest knew why they were fighting. The boys who will carry the wounds to their graves will never permit you nor anyone else to destroy these liberties secured for them by their fathers and which they fought to preserve. Yes, gentlemen, when the world comes to understand the real meaning of all this, you will be asked to explain. I close as I began; I would like to vote for a peace resolution, but I shall not do anything this day which would require the balance of my life in explaining, neither will I do a vain thing. You might just as well ask the city council of one of the municipalities in my district to vote for peace. It would be just as effective as a vote for this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as a very important propositon because it involves the shaking of the checks and balances which have been provided in the Constitution for the various departments of the Government. I have listened with much pleasure to the speeches that have been made for and against this propostion. I listened with particular attention to the speech made by the distinguished member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE]. His speech was logical and well reasoned, but based on an absolutely unsound premise. The gentleman is nearly always right. I have had the pleasure of serving on this committee with him for many years, but I believe in this instance he is as absolutely and entirely wrong as he is generally right, and I am going to reply to him, because he really discussed the resolution and I want to do the same.

The gentleman and other gentlemen have said we want peace. We all want peace, and if this resolution established such a status, as far as it is within the power of the Congress to enact it, this side of the House would be unanimously in favor of its passage. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No one is more anxious to have this country return to all of the conditions of peace than the President of the United States, and the fact that that status actually does not exist technically is the stupendous price that the people of this country are paying for the folly of electing a Republican House and Senate in 1918. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If there had been a Democratic Senate, the Committee on Foreign Relations would not have been packed against the treaty while it was in the making. This is all the more tragic when it is recalled that their majority was obtained by the purchase of a senatorial seat in the State of Michigan—the most shameful and disgraceful debauching of an electorate that has ever occurred in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If there had been a Democratic Senate there would not have been a "round robin," pledging Senators who signed it to vote against the treaty long before it was agreed upon and before they could possibly know what it contained. [Applause on Democratic side.]

If there had been a Democratic Senate the treaty would have been ratified, peace would to-day be blessing the land, the rehabilitation of the war-stricken territory would be progressing in a satisfactory manner. Thus it will be seen that upon the Republican Party rests the responsibility for the repudiation by America of the League of Nations and the refusal thus far of this country to join in a peace which gentlemen on the Republican side claim they are now so anxious for. This responsibility you can not evade by ineffective and unconstitutional resolutions of this character. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that international law lays down three ways of terminating war between belligerent States: First, by treaty; second, by cessation of hostilities; and, third, by subjugation. This is no new discovery, as gentleman on the other side seem to think. It has been the recognized principle for centuries.

We did not subjugate, nor did we desire to subjugate, Germany, so that method need not be considered.

We did not stop fighting. We sent a magnificent Army to France. At Chateau-Thierry they turned the tide of battle; at St. Mihiel, the Argonne, and other places the glorious spirit and courage of the American soldier was shown. An offensive had been projected for this splendid Army for November 14 that would have sent it through the German lines and on to Berlin. We had no idea of stopping the fight, and would not have done so but for the armistice of the 11th. We assented to this armistice. An armistice is an agreement between belligerents to suspend hostilities for a limited time. This armistice was revived from time to time until the treaty was negotiated and ratified by the required number of States. In the name of the brave and valorous boys who constituted the American Expeditionary Forces I repudiate the suggestion that this war ended by a cessation of hostilities. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We, therefore, undertook to terminate this war by negotiation, by agreement, by treaty; and it is a late date for the Republican leaders to discover that it was terminated by a cessation of hostilities, a late date for them to discover that it was terminated because our soldiers did not want to fight any longer. This is a slander of as brave and high-spirited an Army as was ever marshaled in all the tide of time. [Applause.]

But if this contention is true, the Republican leadership of this House have been criminally negligent in their duty to the public in not having undertaken to pass this resolution before.

The treaty was sent to the Senate for ratification or rejection on July 10, 1919; it was reported by the Foreign Relations Committee on September 10, and was debated in the Senate for over two months, and rejected on November 19. It had then been more than a year since hostilities ceased.

Why did not the Republican steering committee of this House have the resolutions brought in after the treaty was rejected the first time? Why wait six months while America and the world suffered and groaned under these restrictive and oppressive war measures? Surely, these learned gentlemen will not admit that they were ignorant that the powers they are attempting to-day to exercise did not reside in this House until they were informed by a group of Senators, and surely if they had known that they had such powers they would not have failed to exercise them. We know, however, that they waited four months after the treaty was rejected before acting. If they are right now, they must assume the responsibility for this delay in the coming of peace, and we can dismiss the discussion, which has been debated at such length in the discussion as to whether the Senate or the President is to blame. If they can end the war by this resolution under the Republican leadership, the House is to blame and is responsible.

If the House possesses the power you claim for it, the Republicans of the House have failed as completely in their duty to the people as have the Republicans of the Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There could be only two reasons for your failure—ignorance and inefficiency or a willingness to play politics with this great issue. Either or both reasons will be condemned by the American people in November. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Another thought has occurred to me. If these Republican leaders are really concerned to restore this country to a state of peace, why do they take no notice of the fact that we are at a state of war with the Imperial Austro-Hungarian Government? Is it because they can not quote a rhetorical statement of the President to base a resolution upon?

Gentlemen proclaim here that the country wants peace, that they have the power to restore peace, and yet they sit idly and inefficiently by and let this war with the Imperial Austro-Hungarian Government go on. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why is it not as important to stop this war as it is to stop the war against the Imperial German Government? Both Governments have gone out of existence, I hope forever. We are trading with both of them as far as they have money or credit to trade with us. The armistice with Austria was a week earlier than that with Germany. We signed the peace treaty, along with the other allied and associated powers, with Austria at St. Germain last September, more than six months ago. This treaty aims at justice and liberty and peace for Europe and America, just as the Versailles treaty does. It provides for the reduction of national armaments and will go a long way in the prevention of future wars. [Applause.]

If this House has the power to propose a peace treaty to a belligerent power, why did the Republican leaders overlook Austria?

There could be but one of two reasons—inefficiency and indifference or ignorance—and at the polls in November the American people will not accept such excuses. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This whole episode is characteristic of the low ebb of efficiency and morality to which the Republican leadership in Congress has fallen. For months the Senate floundered in its dealings with the vital questions of the world's peace and failed utterly to measure up to the expectations of the country and of humanity. And now, to save itself from being utterly discredited, Members of that august body have induced the leadership of this House to inject itself into a situation in which it has no legitimate part or parcel by proposing something more humiliating and more dangerous to many interests in this country than has as yet come from the leadership of even of the Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On yesterday a gentleman complained that the minority report had accused the majority of insincerity and sharp practice in declarations in the preamble to this resolution.

This preamble declares that the President of the United States, in the performance of his constitutional duty to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, has advised the Congress that the war with the Imperial German Government has ended.

There is not a man who voted to report this resolution who did not know that the President had reference to the cessation of actual hostilities and not to the technical termination of the war. To base an important piece of legislation involving the interests of millions of people upon that statement and to distort its meaning is very mildly characterized in the minority report.

Hostilities, or actual fighting, had ceased on the very day when the President made that utterance. An armistice had been signed which contemplated and provided for the negotiation of a treaty of peace which would bring the war to an end.

Within a month after that declaration the President went with a peace commission to Paris to arrange the terms of that treaty of peace. This was known to the world. Ten days after this declaration by the President Congress passed an act prohibiting the manufacture and sale after June 30, 1919, of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. This act was to continue in force during the present war, and thereafter until the end of demobilization. A number of the gentlemen who voted to report this resolution from the Foreign Affairs Committee voted for that act on November 21, 1918. In July, 1919, an act was passed for regulating war-time prohibition. This act was vetoed by the President and was passed over his veto. In reporting that bill to the House the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary used this language:

> That war exists with both Germany and Austria needs no argument. The armistice only suspends actual hostilities, and until treaties of peace have been ratified there is no peace.

This was nearly eight months after the President had made the statement referred to in this preamble. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Many Members on the other side of the aisle voted to pass that measure over the President's veto. I am curious to know how they will reconcile their acts in voting to continue war-time prohibition on the ground that we were at war with the vote they are going to cast to-day for a resolution based upon a preamble which declares that the war had been at an end eight months prior to the time they cast that vote. And if the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is here, I would like to know how he is going to reconcile the declaration he made in the report on June 30, 1919, with the vote in favor of the pending resolution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Since that time this very question has been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and on December 15, 1919, the most august judicial tribunal in the world declared that the war was not at an end. We, therefore, have the actions of the President, of the Congress, and of the courts to refute the statement of this preamble and resolution that the war had come to an end. And yet this statement of the President that "the war thus comes to an end" is used as the basis of this far-reaching and ill-considered proposition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not care to discuss at any great length the constitutionality of this resolution. That question has been ably discussed by a number of gentlemen during this debate, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and others, who have completely demonstrated its unconstitutionality.

I do want to say, though, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], that this resolution constitutes an attempt to establish contractual relations between the Government of this country and the Government of Germany, establishing an agreement which amounts to a treaty, and is therefore a bold invasion of the treaty-making powers, which are the constitutional prerogatives of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. The President has the sole power to initiate the negotiation of treaties. This is a great power, but it is one that in the conception of the founders of our Government was thought wise to lodge in the President. Each of the several branches of our Government has shown great care in endeavoring not to infringe upon the province of the others. No branch of the Government should ever be tempted, for partisan purposes or for other reasons, to invade the proper functions of another branch of the Government, for each one of them, in its proper sphere, is ultimately the sovereignty of this country.

If any other rule is followed, the principles of mere might will be introduced into our system and each branch will proceed to do whatever the other branches have no means to effectually prevent. This will mean the end of Government of and by the people and the beginning of a usurped Government over the people. Written constitutions, being like all human contrivances imperfect, will then have proven impracticable. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But aside from the constitutional questions involved in this resolution, which are of the utmost importance and very far-reaching, the legislation itself, if it were perfectly constitutional and completely in accord with the principles of international law, is dangerous to American interests and the interests of many of the American people.

The title of the United States to the German ships which we seized during the war is very doubtful. These ships have never been through a prize court, and when they were first seized it was the general understanding that unless they did go through a prize court they would be subject to be libeled by their owners in any neutral ports in which they might be found. They were not put through the courts, our Government depending upon the treaty to take care of our interests in them. These ships are of very great value and constitute one of the few items by way of reparation that the American Government will get for its tremendous expenditure of money and blood in the World War. I do not think Congress should hastily and without proper consideration enact a measure that might cause the loss of these ships, and yet this is just what the Republican majority here proposes to do. You could not play the German game better if you were their chosen spokesman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Alien Property Custodian funds, amounting to something over $500,000,000, can not be dealt with otherwise than by restoration to the owners, unless German consent to their application to other purposes is obtained. This resolution, if it becomes law, would make it impossible to obtain Germany's consent.

The resolution declares that a state of peace exists, and provides for the repeal of war-time laws, and then attempts to impose the harsh terms of the resolution upon Germany upon the threat of cutting off commercial relations with her. No one who has studied the history of the Versailles treaty and considered the reluctance with which Germany consented to it and signed it would think for a moment that Germany would consent to a resolution that imposes upon her again the obligations of that treaty. So far as we are concerned, she is free from the terms of that treaty, and we will never get her to assent to its terms again. International law does not permit the confiscation of private property unless the enemy government consents of the use of such property for the satisfaction of claims against it. Without Germany's consent, we can not take that property. Under the Versailles treaty Germany consented that the claims of the United States and its nationals against the German Government might be satisfied out of it. Out of this fund we expected to take care of the widows and orphans who were made so by the Lusitania outrage and other outrages practiced against civilization by the German Government during the war. The rights of these people will be put in peril, if not sacrificed, by this legislation. What answer will the Republican majority make to the representatives and loved ones of those who suffered these outrages? Do you think the American people will approve the surrender of these claims? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, if Germany does not assent to this resolution our people will be the sufferers. We are the people who have things to sell that the Germans are buying, and they will increase in their desire to buy as soon as their credits are properly established. Our cotton growers and our tobacco growers, our meat raisers and our grain growers, our packing houses and our flour millers, and other producers of the necessities which Germany wants would be the sufferers by the punishment which this resolution proposes to inflict.

If this resolution should become law and is accepted by Germany, we would cut ourselves off from our right under the treaty of Versailles for reimbursement for our army of occupation in Germany. This amounts to probably $100,000,000 or more. The Republican Party has proclaimed its purposes of economy, and so far has failed in all of them. Is it willing to throw away $100,000,000 and force our Government either to issue bonds or levy taxes in order to meet the necessary expenses of the Government? If this result comes about, the Republican leadership of this House will be responsible for it, for here is $100,000,000 you are absolutely throwing away. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The adoption of this resolution and its attempt to alienate ourselves from our allies and make a separate peace with Germany will deprive us of representation upon the reparation commission. We should realize that by the terms of the treaty of Versailles the influence and power of a large part of the world is concentrated behind the decisions of this commission. This resolution will deprive us of the veto power which we have heretofore had upon the acts of this commission and destroy the commercial interest of our people in many parts of the world. These interests will hold the Republican Party responsible for this reckless surrender of American rights and interests.

From whatever angle this resolution is viewed, it presents itself as a proposition not only ineffective in achieving its proclaimed purpose but as a sure method of confusing our foreign relations, injecting new and complicated questions into an already difficult situation, and involving a surrender of American rights and an impairment of American prestige and honor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentlemen who favor this resolution have expressed great anxiety for the repeal of war-time legislation, and yet section 2 of the resolution does not do this. It is a declaratory statute. I would favor going further in this line than section 2 goes. No one ever questioned the power of Congress to repeal any legislation it enacted. Much of this legislation is burdensome and oppressive in times of peace. The Republicans have had control of this House for nearly a year. In that time they have accomplished little. During that time they could have repealed all of this burdensome legislation. I shall offer a motion to recommit, which will accomplish something along this line and will show whether the gentlemen on the other side are really in favor of any relief to the people who are burdened by the long-continued existence of the war legislation or whether they are endeavoring to make political capital for the coming campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have no doubt they will vote against my motion to recommit, because it really means something, and the debate on this resolution has demonstrated that their purpose is not to accomplish any result beneficial to America, but is an attempt to fasten upon the President the responsibility which belongs to the Republicans of the Senate for the existence of a technical state of war between this country and Germany.

Some 16 months ago the President of the United States went to Paris as the head of the peace commission to aid in making peace between the warring nations of the world. There he met in the arena of international politics the shrewdest diplomats of the Old World, and was confronted with the most difficult questions that ever taxed the brain of man. It was an enormous task, and he poured into the service all the power of his mighty intellect, his great spiritual force, and his tremendous physical energy. He triumphed, but he wrecked his health and almost sacrificed his life. He brought back a document signed by 32 of the civilized nations of the earth. It contained the League of Nations, the principles of which had been indorsed by every political party in this country, and which the people favored in overwhelming numbers. This league is indispensable to the gradual bringing into execution of the new policies the treaty embodies. It is a league which, with American backing, would bring order and peace throughout the civilized world. Without it the sacrifices America made for the world would be in vain. With it, the treasure spent and the young lives sacrificed would have secured an immense gain for mankind. The league and the treaty are one and inseparable, and will go down in history as the most memorable international agreement ever made. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This treaty should have been promptly ratified so that peace could be brought to a stricken world and the various nations that had been engaged in the great war could begin the work of rehabilitation that would have brought hope and life and prosperity to their peoples. It was ratified by most of them. The Republicans of the Senate encumbered it with such nullifying reservations as made its ratification impossible. Their leaders had determined to play politics with this mighty issue. A war-torn and, in places, a starving world meant nothing to them, if the changing of these conditions and the saving of these people would bring prestige to the President of the United States.

Everybody everywhere was committed to the treaty and the league that so many believed would prevent the recurrence of war. For the first time in the annals of the human race it seemed possible to attain this great objective. But the Republican leadership in the Senate, placing partisanship above patriotism and above humanity, have crossed and thwarted the noble purposes of the peace conference, and have denied this precious boon to the people of this country and the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] said yesterday that all the other nations were at peace and we were at war. The gentleman from Indiana said that all the other nations of the world were at war and we were at peace. The gentleman from Indiana is nearer right than the gentleman from Alabama, because revolution threatens to almost engulf Europe. And even in this country we see unrest and disturbances of a most disquieting character. We see our commerce still hovering about American shores instead of seeking the innumerable avenues that would have been open to it if the world were at peace. We see our industries halted, our labor dissatisfied, our farmers flocking to the cities, and a general state of unrest in the country which is appalling, all brought about by the insincere, unpatriotic attitude of the Republican Party in reference to the Versailles treaty. Truly the world is paying a stupendous price for the Republican victory of 1918. Truly the debauching of the Michigan electorate in that year in the Newberry senatorial election has proved a curse not only to this country but to the world. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, there are really so many good reasons why the peace resolution now before the House should be immediately passed that one can hardly justify the waste of time for general debate before passing the same.

I have recently visited almost every important city in Europe between Vienna and Madrid, as well as the principal cities of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, and I therefore feel that I know just a little about present existing conditions in Europe.

If America could realize that there are positively millions of lean, hungry, sad-faced, tubercular children in Germany today, the peace resolution would be immediately passed.

A declaration of peace would remove war obstructions to diplomatic, commercial, and banking relations which would in turn promote credits and delivery of raw materials and foodstuffs and thereby probably save a newborn Republic from a military dictatorship, monarchy, or Bolshevism.

Awaiting credits and raw materials these wretched people who are anxious for work stare hungrily into restaurants and shop windows containing food.

A German Republic looks only to America for its very life and existence as commercial representatives of England and France are negotiating for trade supremacy and making enormous purchases, while the mark is nearly valueless and a desperate people will sign any agreement to insure a scant living.

Sickly little boys and girls as well as adults of a Christian nation are praying that that same humane element which prompted America's entrance into a bloody carnage will now assist them in holding body and soul together, and I am certain that their prayers will be heard and answered.

Mr. Speaker, when President Wilson, Lloyd-George, Clemenceau, and Orlando drew up the treaty of peace with Germany, which destroyed everything of productive value within Germany and Austria, they failed to provide something to take the place of the German economic structure, which was practically supplying food for 300,000,000 people in continental Europe as well as raw materials which through manufactories brought them their daily labor and sustenance.

The natural result of this awful blunder, which has brought starvation and Bolshevism to central Europe, was the almost complete destruction of the French, Belgian, Russian, Polish, Italian, and Swiss economic structures, which were literally carried by the German foundation, upon which they all rested to a greater or less degree.

It has been said that the "big four" who framed the treaty were so preoccupied with personal ambitions that they failed entirely to comprehend what any advanced student in international diplomacy and commerce might have known—that in destroying everything with which Germany and Austria might have been able to pay their debts they also were destroying the machinery which gave life and industry to the greater portion of Europe, even outside of Germany.

The President's mind was preoccupied on his Utopian scheme for a society of nations for the perpetuation of peace and happiness on a rose-scented earth, with sunshine, flowers, sweet music, and gentle zephyrs.

Lloyd-George's sole ambition seemed to be to satisfy the British press and the promises he had made for tremendous indemnity and reparations during a heated political campaign.

Orlando's ambition for territorial expansion in the Trentino and the Fiume localities was so shortsighted as to prevent his seeing or thinking of anything else, while Clemenceau was preoccupied upon the complete destruction of everything that was attached to Germany in his innate fear that natural German superiority would rise and again dominate central Europe.

Is it any wonder that when so preoccupied the "big four" failed to observe and to provide for the one thing which meant more to all Europe and to the world than everything else in the treaty?

Mr. Speaker, without the establishment of a tremendous credit system, backed by our Federal reserve banks, Europe will be in the throes of political unrest, Bolshevism, and even war for many years to come, and the mere sending of American millions of dollars will not even afford temporary relief and is almost waste of good money.

I firmly believe that unbiased students of world diplomacy are practically in accord on the opinion that a tremendous blunder was made at Versailles and that the peace treaty, if not rewritten, will have to be materially readjusted by the League of Nations, not only in the interest of Germany and Austria but in order to save Europe from itself in the advance of Bolshevism and terrorism which is now being kindled in practically every European country, including England.

Unless some sympathy and mercy are shown and hatreds are forgotten, that frightful war is likely to be the beginning of the end of the white race, and another hundred years will see the complete domination of the earth's surface by the yellow man of the Orient.

To paralyze Germany industrially and commercially, agreeable as it might be to those who can see no good in anything German, is but to promote an awful canyon of anarchy and Bolshevism into which most of Europe must eventually slide, and God only knows the ends to which the white man may be driven in getting out of that hell of destruction.

All of Europe is very largely an economic unit, and I predict that peace and good will with commercial tranquillity will never prevail there until all Europe, including Germany and Austria, go hand in hand together in the restoration and rehabilitation of trade and industry.

It is now generally recognized that Germany and Austria can not be completely destroyed and at the same time make payments of indemnities and reparations.

You can not kill a thing and yet expect it to live and work for you, but that is what has been exacted of Germany in the treaty of Versailles.

Mr. Speaker, if the United States could find some means of financing a credit system on raw materials for Germany, to be paid in the return of finished products and by so doing take men off the streets and give them the employment they desire, I am quite satisfied that Germany would quickly restore herself and in so doing assist greatly in the restoration of Europe.

Without the assistance of the greatest and strongest Nation on earth Germany can not resume work with empty warehouses, with disheartened and physically weakened workmen, with no ships worth mentioning, and with the necessity of opening trade anew with a hostile world, and the quicker we appreciate this condition, not necessarily in the interest of Germany and Austria, as I have heretofore said, but in the interest of common humanity, the better for all the world.

The suggestion is constantly heard that Germany should "get to work." How can she go to work when her mark, ordinarily worth 25 cents, is worth but a penny and her overseas credit has been destroyed, while her ships have been taken from her and her local transportation practically wiped out of existence, and when she herself has been the mainstay of all continental Europe in the delivery of raw materials with which their factory wheels were turned?

The economic rehabilitation of France and Belgium is largely dependent on the payment of an indemnity by Germany, and this payment can not be forthcoming until the German factories start grinding out finished products, and this, in turn, can not prevail until American ingenuity and humanity get behind a European trade council based on sound principles and backed by the Federal Reserve Banking System.

When this has been accomplished the wheels of peace and industry will start grinding and killing the seeds of anarchy and Bolshevism, and not until then.

Take it from me, militarism is as dead in Germany as it is in America, and the quicker we realize that and recognize a starving, striving, Christian, white man's Republic, the better for humanity's sake.

Germany was so decisively defeated in the war that it will require one generation at least to put her in company with the second-rate powers of the earth, and several generations to reach the status as a competitor that she held before the war.

She will never again be a military power, because her form of government always will be antagonistic to militarism even in its mildest form.

Refusal of soldiers in uniform to salute their superior officers on the street is an evidence of the extreme reaction against anything militaristic.

This trend toward so-called democratic socialism is prevalent not only in Germany but in all of Europe, where every throne is poised on a magazine of dynamite surrounded by torches.

Mr. Speaker, I was also impressed with the seriousness of the general economic and political situation in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

The man who says that Ireland is loaded with prosperity, that its banks are bulging with money because of Irish industry and thrift, and that the people were never so satisfied as at present, is not writing for Ireland but for England.

The people of Ireland are heartbroken, dejected, exceedingly poor, and think only of the freedom which has so long been uppermost in their minds, and until this matures Ireland will continue to be the saddest community in all Europe.

The most cherished human principle is the right of self-determination, and while we Americans are willing to apply it to all the world, I could see no sane reason why those five and one-half million souls, who are capable of self-government, should be discriminated against by England.

In conclusion, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that for two long days this House has listened to debate by Members on both sides, with hair-splitting arguments on the constitutionality of this so-called peace resolution. I am not a lawyer, but I for one am willing to take my chance on its being as constitutional as that obnoxious, undesirable, unnecessary, unpopular Volstead prohibition enforcement act that was forced upon the American people by this Congress while 4,000,000 of our "boys" were away from home defending the flag. [Laughter and applause.] I appreciate the applause and recognize the laughter, but I am wondering if you gentlemen really dare amend the Volstead Act. I am wondering if you are afraid to bring it on the floor, where it would be amended, and you know it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with much interest to what has been said in the consideration of this resolution. Its purpose is to terminate the war by act of Congress. Some say that Congress can not declare the war at an end for the reason that such action would be making a treaty with Germany, and no one has any power to make a treaty but the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds voting therefor, under Article II, section 2, of the Constitution, which is as follows:

ART. II, SEC. 2. He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. * * *

This gives the President power to make a treaty, with the advice and consent of the Senate. But we are not making a treaty. We are declaring that the war is at an end. If this simple resolution is a treaty, the President took a great deal of pains with the making of his treaty at Versailles, which involved the work of months to draft. It cost thousands of dollars in treasure. It involved a retinue exceeding in splendor that of an oriental potentate. It is ludicrous to call or denominate this resolution a treaty. That is giving it a false name and attributing to it a false purpose. The first two sections of the resolution providing for ending the war read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States; permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Whereas the President of the United States, in the performance of his constitutional duty to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, has advised the Congress that the war with the Imperial German Government has ended:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

SEC. 2. That in the interpretation of any provision relating to the date of the termination of the present war or of the present or existing emergency in any acts of Congress, joint resolutions, or proclamations of the President containing provisions contingent upon the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, the date when this resolution becomes effective shall be construed and treated as the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, notwithstanding any provision in any act of Congress or joint resolution providing any other mode of determining the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency.

SEC. 3. That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with the German Government and its nationals, and for this purpose, it is hereby provided that unless within 45 days from the date when this resolution becomes effective the German Government shall duly notify the President of the United States that it has declared a termination of the war with the United States and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles, the President of the United States shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to proclaim the fact that the German Government has not given the notification hereinbefore mentioned and thereupon and until the President shall have proclaimed the receipt of such notification, commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany and the making of loans or credits, and the furnishing of financial assistance or supplies to the German Government or the inhabitants of Germany, directly or indirectly, by the Government or the inhabitants of the United States shall, except with the license of the President, be prohibited.

SEC. 4. That whoever shall willfully violate the foregoing prohibition whenever the same shall be in force shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; and the officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation shall be punished by a like fine, imprisonment, or both, and any property, funds, securities, papers, or other articles or documents, or any vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment, concerned in such violation, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as a waiver by the United States of any rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which the United States has become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States by reason of its participation in the war, or otherwise; and all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States are hereby ratified, confirmed, and maintained.

Its purpose is to express the sentiment and will of the Nation on every hand to end the war. Its purpose is to cry aloud from this Capitol Hill, so that any man a mile or more away can hear that the war is ended. Its purpose is to take from the President of the United States the great war powers conferred upon him in waging war against Germany. Its purpose is to give congressional sanction to the peace already existing between the United States and Germany. We are not at war with Germany. We are not at war with any nation. Why can we not say so? We are not hors de combat. We are non de combat, especially with Germany, which lies prostrate as a warring nation. Let us declare that we are not at war with Germany, so that everybody will know it, even if he thinks otherwise. Let us bring our army home. If anyone thinks we are at war with Germany, he is mistaken. I have been for war whenever it was needed and wherever it is needed to preserve the honor, integrity, and sovereignty of the United States. The most humiliating days of my career were when our troops were sent home by Carranza, instead of vindicating the lives of American citizens who were ruthlessly killed in Mexico by Mexican troops. If we want to uphold our sovereignty and force peace on foreign nations and protect their political identity as provided in the League of Nations, we might take a hand down in Mexico. It would be nearer home. The President declared this Mexican war, and it ended without a treaty. This resolution ought to pass as a first step toward a return to our former normal conditions. When the war was ended there ought to have been a separate and distinct peace treaty. It ought not to have been ingrafted into a League of Nations. Some people think it is more important to have a League of Nations than to have peace. If we had a League of Nations to-day, and we were directed by the supreme council to establish peace, political identity, and preserve the boundaries of the European nations, we would need our army of 5,000,000 soldiers to do it. The League of Nations is a one-sided, jug-handled affair, as far as the United States is concerned. It calls on the United States for men and money to settle the disputes of other countries which involve none of our business. If a treaty of peace is needed to end the war and our Democratic friends think no one can make such a treaty but the President of the United States, then the President of the United States has failed in his duty.

The people of the United States want peace, and if we can get it by simple treaty, and the President is the only one who can make a treaty, why does not he make it? Some think that the Constitution must be followed to the letter in making a treaty to end the war. The international law writers say peace can be established after a war without a treaty. Some might say, then, what is the use of this resolution? It is because there are more than 30 war powers conferred upon the President now in existence which are to terminate whenever peace is declared, and it is for the twofold purpose of ending the war and ending the war powers conferred upon the President. No one has claimed they should continue. No one has made any other formidable objection to this resolution except that it is unconstitutional. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to declare war. The terms are identical in language with the power of the President to make a treaty, omitting the advice and consent of the Senate. The President made war on Mexico without any action of Congress, although the Constitution is specific that the right to declare war is conferred upon Congress; and those wanting to stick so closely to the Constitution never objected when the President marched our Army into Mexico nor when he marched them out and thereby established peace. The League of Nations is at the foundation of the whole difficulty. The President never submitted to the Senate a formal peace treaty. The Senate has never had an opportunity to approve, or consent, or advise as to a separate treaty of peace. I think there is a difference between a peace treaty and a covenant for a League of Nations to prevent wars in the world. The whole of Europe is virtually at war. How would we look over in Russia to-day with our Army to establish the political identity of the Russian Government? Who would want to have such a chaotic government as Russia has to-day, with the right of property and boundary lines destroyed and social and individual rights determined by autocracy? The treaty submitted to the Senate to ratify was drawn with the express purpose so that it could not be ratified without our country joining the League of Nations, which would establish a supernation. The real purpose of the document submitted to the Senate was not to establish peace but to establish a League of Nations, and it will be to the everlasting credit of the United States of America that it failed to ratify such a covenant. Let us keep away from a League of Nations and follow the advice of Washington and the founders of our Republic. Let us say we are not at war by passing this resolution. The Constitution in no place prohibits us from passing a resolution declaring a state of peace. Let us have peace. Let us consider the League of Nations separate and apart from the peace treaty, if it is found to be needful, useful, or helpful to our national welfare. It can then be considered on its own merits. I firmly believe that the League of Nations, as drawn, is un-American and alone would stand no show of ever becoming a law.

What, then, is the use? What is the purpose of keeping up a state of war between the United States and Germany? I know of no reason. I can think of no good purpose. The one purpose and reason I now think of is that if the people can not get peace any other way it might force the Senate to ratify the League of Nations, but the Senate will not ratify such a league as it was submitted. It seems also that the President will not submit a separate treaty of peace without combining it with this league. Therefore, let us pass this resolution and get our Army back home out of European politics and European domestic affairs. Just now we have quite a little to do at home in looking after our own domestic welfare. I wish to close my remarks by incorporating a part of the report of the great Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, which contains many pronounced and eminent lawyers. The Congress has full power to pass the resolution. On this point the report says:

> There has been a complete suspension of hostilities on both sides without any intention of resuming them. Congress is clearly exercising powers which are within its constitutional rights in recognizing and declaring that the condition described by the writers on international law which are above quoted has now arrived and that the war is at an end. As by the resolution of April 6, 1917, Congress officially recognized the fact that war had been thrust upon us, so now it becomes the duty of Congress to give official recognition to the fact that the war is ended. Moreover, the general welfare of the United States imperatively demands that all uncertainty upon this subject shall cease, and that the extraordinary war powers of the Government shall be vacated and set aside.

I shall support the resolution.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks on the resolution I want to express my very sincere regret at the sudden illness of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] during the debate this afternoon. I am sure we all join in the hope that his illness will be brief and that he will very soon be restored to his usual splendid physical and mental condition and be with us again. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, by the cessation of hostilities the World War ended, as the President declared at the time, November 11, 1918, and the American people who have waited with extraordinary patience for 17 months for action officially securing and declaring the end of war and the restoration of normal conditions are looking to us to-day to do our part in the reestablishment of a state and condition of peace.

We are thankful to the minority for that part of their report on this resolution which so conclusively justifies its adoption in order that we may, as they say, afford "relief from the burdens, inconveniences, extravagances, and losses which come from the existence of this—war—legislation." We have given heed to the demand which reaches the Congress from every section of the country for this relief from war legislation, the hampering and vexatious and blighting character of which has been eloquently stated by the minority, and we shall respond to this demand with a practically unanimous vote on the Republican side. [Applause on the Republican side.]

From the viewpoint of partisan advantage we might be tempted to hope that few on the minority side shall support this resolution, for nothing could so clearly demonstrate to the country the constructive patriotism of the Republican Party on the one hand, and a narrow and provincial partisanship on the part of the minority, as a sharp division of the vote on party lines.

But the issue is too important for partisanship, and while I shall not appeal to the gentlemen on the minority side to follow the dictates of their consciences rather than those of partisanship, I am reminded what a splendid thing it would be if, as we all joined in the declaration under which the Republic drew the sword and sent millions of her youth to battle, we could now join in the official declaration of the establishment of conditions of peace and in the return to the people of the extraordinary authority and jurisdiction which, in their name, we placed in the hands of the Chief Executive for the purposes of war. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Through the days of strife and struggle we on the Republican side joined in furnishing men and money and authority without stint or limit, so it would appear seemly and proper that the House should be united when we proclaim the fact of peace, known of all men, and in doing so return to the people the extraordinary powers we are authorized to invoke only under the stress of war. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is not essential to the discussion of this resolution that we shall consider the occurrences which have made it necessary. On the other hand, it is proper that we should recall that the only reason why conditions of peace have not been restored through the more usual method of a treaty is because the Chief Executive refused to sanction in the legislative body which coordinates with him under the Constitution in the making of treaties the same freedom of judgment and action that he insisted upon for himself. For it is known of all men who care to be informed that the prevailing opinion in the matter is confirmed by the public announcement of a Democratic Senator that but for the pressure by the Chief Executive to the contrary the treaty would have been ratified with reservations safeguarding the Republic and preserving its sovereignty and peace thus secured and proclaimed.

In such a situation is there anyone with so poor an opinion of our form of Government as to believe that, having waited patiently 17 months for a treaty of peace, for the relief from burdensome and extraordinary control, for the reestablishment of normal conditions of trade and intercourse, we are helpless to cure the situation and must indefinitely wait upon the will of one man, and he the one on whom we have conferred powers and prerogatives and jurisdiction which the people have carefully reserved in themselves only to be guardedly conferred upon the President during the imperative exigencies of war.

As we glory in our country and in our Constitution, we decline to accept a construction so narrow, so destructive, so subversive of the theory and principles of the Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

No one approached the preparation of this resolution without appreciation of the differences of opinion liable to arise as to phraseology and formula, but out of an abundance of council came clarity of thought and unanimity of opinion, both as to form and substance. And yet all realized that in relation to a proceeding somewhat novel, some valid objections might have been overlooked, and some suggestion of change of real merit might be made. But since the popping of the pickets on Tuesday, the firing of the siege guns in the minority report, through the booming and rattle of light and heavy artillery of debate, including a considerable number of popguns and some duds, not a real, substantial, or convincing thought has been advanced or argument made against either the plan, purpose, or pattern of the resolution. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Out of the smoke screen of political camouflage, through the cloud of variegated gas, one curiously illogical note has whined its way through the atmosphere of debate. They say the Republicans are trying to embarrass the President! The wicked Republicans, who are accused of spending a large part of their time assailing the President, are charged with some sinister purpose in connection with this resolution, touching the Chief Executive.

A large part of the criticism I have heard of the President has filtered out of the Democratic cloak rooms. I have heard surprisingly little of it, everything considered, elsewhere; but however that may be, everybody knows, except those who are willfully misled, that there is neither infringement of executive authority nor aught of embarrassment to the Executive in this resolution. There is not unless, indeed, the Executive may voluntarily assume the embarrassment of vetoing a measure which has the approval, the commendation, and the enthusiastic support of an overwhelming majority of the people.

Is it not about time that our friends on the other side got to thinking in terms of the Republic and cease to have their acts and public utterances colored and controlled by influences having their sources in the Executive Mansion? [Applause on the Republican side.]

We are still, thank God, a government of, for, and by the people, and without thought or purpose of encroaching upon the proper authority and jurisdiction of anyone, we are under our oaths, and in the full light and under the full authority of the Constitution, proposing to legislate, not to please this, that, or the other individual, organization, or agency, but for, on behalf, and in the interest of all of the people of the Republic in the reestablishment of a state of peace. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. All time for debate has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under the rule does the previous question operate upon the motion to recommit as well as on the final vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does. The Chair will decide that question when it arises. The previous question was ordered by the rule. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The question was taken, and the joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the preamble is agreed to.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and on that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FLOOD offers the following motion to recommit:

That House joint resolution No. 327 be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions to the committee to report the same to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

Strike out all the preamble and all after the enacting clause and insert following the enacting clause the following:

"That all acts and joint resolutions of Congress which have been passed since April 6, 1917, and which by their terms are to be effective only for the period of the war, or for the present or existing emergency, or until a treaty of peace should be ratified, or until the proclamation by the President of the ratification of a treaty of peace, are hereby repealed; and all such acts and resolutions which by their terms are to be effective only during and for a specified period after such war, or such present or existing emergency, or the ratification of such treaty, or the proclamation by the President of the ratification of such treaty, are hereby repealed, which repeal shall be effective at the end of the specified period, such specified period being construed as beginning on the date of the final passage of this resolution."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the rule and is of opinion that the previous question is not necessary. The rule provides:

That at the conclusion of the general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the said House joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

That clause, in the opinion of the Chair, prevents any motion to amend and makes the previous question unnecessary. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to recommit the joint resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 171, nays 222, answered "present" 2, not voting 32, as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 10, 1920.

Rev. Richard H. Bennett, D. D., of Lynchburg, Va., offered the following prayer:

Gracious Father, source of all wisdom and God of all power, we acknowledge Thy sovereignty and pray for Thy guidance. Thou hast graciously led us and blest us beyond our deserts. In our feebleness compared with Thy great strength, in our ignorance compared with Thy wisdom, children all in Thy sight, we ask Thy continued guidance and blessing.

We thank Thee for the gracious record of our Nation, and for the possibilities of the future that brighten and glorify the days to come. We pray Thee that the responsibilities of the present may be adequately met and that Thy guidance may be sought and obtained by all our citizenship high and low.

We pray Thy blessing upon Thy servant the President of the United States, that he may be restored to complete health and strength, and that all Thy people in every office may be guided by Thee. We pray Thy blessing upon each of us that we may be delivered from the mistakes that belong to human nature and that we may seek Thy holy will in all our doings.

We thank Thee for the gracious life that the Senate commemorates to-day and for the useful career of our departed friend and father. We pray Thee that the lessons of his life may be handed down, that we may profit thereby, and that the enrichment may come to us from the virtues that adorned his character.

We pray Thy blessing upon every Member of the Senate and upon the homes represented here, that Thy gracious protection and care may be given unto each and every one, that those in sickness may be delivered and strengthened, and that when life shall close with each of us we may look back upon days spent in accordance with Thy plans, to a life used as Thou hast given us wisdom to see it, and enter through the gates into that eternal city where Thy children shall gather when the battles of life are over and we come to the day of rest.

Grant these things in the name of our Savior. Amen.

On request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR MARTIN.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 347) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow in the death of the Hon. THOMAS STAPLES MARTIN, late a Senator from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, pursuant to its order heretofore made, assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, we have convened to-day to pay appropriate tribute to the life, character, and achievements of our former colleague, Senator THOMAS S. MARTIN, of Virginia. Having been intimately associated with him for more than 30 years, I appreciate how inadequate are my powers of speech to give expression to the profound esteem, friendship, and admiration I entertained for him or properly to portray his manly worth and great nobility of character. Under the shadows of a deep personal loss and sorrow in his death, silence, if permissible to me, would have been far preferable to speech. I am fully sensible that in his death I have lost my best, dearest, and most intimate friend.

Mr. President, Senator MARTIN was possessed of such high qualities of mind and character that he would have attained distinction in any line of human endeavor to which he had chosen to direct his energies. He thought directly, clearly. His mind was never encumbered with subtle distinctions nor beclouded by vague and far-distant deductions. He looked at things with a clear, unblinking vision—almost prophetic. No sophistry, no alluring eloquence could hold captive his strong, sturdy sense or induce him to depart from the tried pathway of prudence and good judgment into the unknown regions of uncertain adventure or experiment. This rugged granite strength made him a pillar of salvation in hours of doubt, panic, and stress. The more others became disturbed or excited, the greater was his composure, his thoughtful consideration. This quality inspired confidence and insured his leadership. No great commander on a field of battle could exhibit at critical times greater calmness, skill, and resourcefulness than he displayed in the many fierce conflicts which marked his long political life.

Senator MARTIN was not a plausible man, but he was a deeply wise one. Plausibility scintillates and shines upon the surface, but does not penetrate an inch beneath. Wisdom without glitter or glare goes to the deepest depths and sees the very foundation of things. He was wisdom personified. His rare good judgment, his prudent discretion, were so marked and well known that his advice was sought far and wide by those engaged in varied vocations. He was the wisest counselor I ever knew. Politicians, lawyers, large business men, governors, Senators, Cabinet members, and Presidents sought with confidence his advice and conclusions upon delicate and difficult matters. The public little knows the many acts of beneficial legislation, the wise solution of many difficult public questions that were due to his unerring judgment and forcible insistence. His opinion was expressed with the utmost frankness—sometimes it was almost brutal in its manly candor and courage. Equivocation and dissimulation were foreign to his mind and were scorned in all his expressions. He loathed a lie. His opinions were fixed and positive, and given regardless of those entertained by others. By nature it was impossible for him to be a timeserver or incense burner to those in high official position. His intellectual integrity, his candor of expression, he scorned to surrender to anyone. I have frequently witnessed exhibitions of this high quality which strikingly displayed his innate greatness and courage. One always obtained from Senator MARTIN the plain, unvarnished truth as he saw it. He was direct, positive, and candid in all dealings with his constituents. He abominated the petty, ingratiating arts of the demagogue and achieved his great political successes by masculine strength and courage.

The people of Virginia passionately admired him as a rugged oak where they could seek refuge and shelter in hours of storm and stress. In his long service in the Senate he never shirked a roll call nor dodged an issue. His conclusions were reached after the most thoughtful and careful consideration and when made were fearlessly expressed and firmly adhered to regardless of all personal and political consequences. He scorned by explanation or evasion to avoid full responsibility for any position ever assumed by him on public questions. He never acted hastily, and hence never apologized for his well-formed and firm convictions. These he could always successfully defend with the most cogent and convincing reasons.

Mr. President, Senator MARTIN was without exception the most indefatigable worker I ever knew. He was a marvel of industry and energy. He had no recreation except such as was obtained from varied but incessant work. Possessed of a splendid constitution, always working orderly and intelligently, the amount of work he could efficiently dispose of was prodigious. So great was his capacity for work that he could attend to the smallest wishes of his constituency and still find ample time to study and dispose of the large public questions which his important position placed under his direction. He had a genius for detail. He completely mastered all measures which were under his control in the Senate. His knowledge of them was excelled by none. The ease and facility with which he passed so many important measures through the Senate were largely due to the fact that the Senate had full confidence in his judgment and integrity, and knew he was fully informed upon all the details and phases of the legislation he proposed. It was wonderful the great mass of detail his memory was able to retain.

Mr. President, combined with these admirable, sterling qualities was a heart as loyal to every demand of friendship as ever pulsated in human breast. It can be said with equal truth of him, as was said of Old Hickory, President Jackson, "he never failed a friend, he never forgot a favor." No considerations of personal comfort, no apprehension of personal detriment, no promptings of personal profit, could ever induce him to fail a friend or refuse any demand that friendship had a right to claim. This quality was almost a passion with him. How frequently in the political strife of our State have I seen him unhesitatingly and firmly take his stand for loyal friends against excited clamor and when he knew success was not possible. These considerations did not slightly influence him; his loyal heart resolutely determined, despite all personal consequences, fully to meet friendship's demands. This marked characteristic gave him a personal and devoted following equaled by none in our State. Men became attached to him with hooks of iron and steel, which nothing could sever. This firm and enthusiastic following gave him a permanency in politics which can never be attained by those who simply strive to sail with popular breezes. No man when convinced of the rectitude of his conduct could more resolutely face a storm. Another quality which he possessed almost to heroic proportions was the composure with which he could meet unavoidable misfortunes. He bore his own worries and troubles without burdening others. His life was composed of sparkling sunshine and darkened shadows, each of which he passed through with calm courage. He knew his last illness would be fatal, yet he neither quailed nor quivered when brought face to face with death.

In his last hours he forcibly reminded me of the noblest of Roman senators, calmly gathering his robes around him and fearlessly meeting inevitable death, which awaits us all. He entertained no apprehensions of the great future beyond.

Mr. President, Senator MARTIN possessed in a preeminent degree those domestic virtues and that honorable moral character which are so highly cherished in Virginia and which she scrupulously requires of her public men. He was pure in mind, in thought, and in conduct. No stain ever followed his footsteps. No suggestion of scandal, public or private, ever besmirched his fair name. He was the soul of generosity and liberal, honorable dealing. Like Virginians, the ties of blood and relationship were strong and enduring. His personal life was one of service and sacrifice for others. From early boyhood, when the loss of his father left him the head and main support of a large family, to his death he toiled and thought more for the comfort of those near and dear to him than for himself. His deep devotion, his constant care of and attention to his aged mother, form beautiful chapters in the story of his magnificent life. He was a most affectionate and responsive brother, a most considerate, devoted, and unselfish father. He was a husband of rare excellence, possessed of an absorbing love and ever happy in bestowing sweet, loving attentions. Those of us who knew him intimately realized that several years ago the large part of his happiness and most of the sunshine of his life were buried in the grave with his beautiful, brilliant, and charming wife. This man of iron strength and resolution gave new graces to social life, brought new charms to domestic felicity.

Mr. President, Senator MARTIN's success was founded more on solid than shining qualities and was builded securely on the strong foundation of substantial moral character and thorough reliability. These virtues are indispensable to permanent success in public life.

No brilliance of genius, no witchery of oratory, no fascinations of personality can supply the deficiency. The possessing of these sterling virtues in a preeminent degree by Andrew Jackson enabled him to repeatedly defeat the genius of Webster and Clay combined. How strikingly is this truth illustrated in the life of Mirabeau, the great Frenchman. Mirabeau was a marvelous character, endowed with tireless energy, a resolute, courageous heart, a fervid patriotism, a surpassing eloquence. He possessed every virtue but moral character. On account of this defect he was never able to obtain the complete confidence of the French people so as to be able to control and direct their destiny. In the hours of his greatest power he never had influence sufficient to stabilize the great reforms he advocated and to place France safely in the pathway of sane betterment. Thus poor France had to endure all the terrors of the Revolution, suffer all the vicissitudes of Napoleon, because her greatest man, the one capable and desirous of saving her, was powerless to do so for lack of strong moral character sufficient to inspire the complete trust of the French people, which was indispensable for the accomplishment of the Herculean task. One of the crying needs of the world to-day is more statesmanship founded in rugged moral character, capable of squarely meeting the difficult problems confronting us and dealing with them with firm hand and resolute will. We need to-day brave, unflinching Catos, fearlessly facing troubles, more than eloquent Ciceros, glozing over evils and lulling us with pleasing platitudes and alluring prophecies. The world seems to acquire each year more exquisite flowers, but possesses less rugged oaks for refuge in hours of storm and stress. Many of our public men are like our modern clothes, very beautiful in the gaudy colors of their new freshness, but not able to stand the wear and tear of continual use and soon become faded and threadbare.

But, Mr. President, this was not true of Senator MARTIN. On account of the fierce political contests he was continuously engaged in, no man ever lived more completely than he in the pitiless light of publicity. Enmity and jealousy engaged in every exaggeration of criticism and faultfinding, yet during his long public service each receding year brought him increased confidence, enlarged influence, and greater popularity. Five successive times did the people of Virginia emphasize their trust and affection for him by commissioning him to represent them in this august assembly, the highest honor at their disposal. The last time he had no opposition in the Democratic primary, none in the general election. He was the unanimous choice of the Virginia people. His manly worth, his genuine merit, his sturdy character, his valuable and patriotic service had so deeply impressed the people of Virginia that with one accord they demanded he should represent them in these troublous and perilous times. Virginia has bestowed upon Senator MARTIN honors which she has conferred upon but few of her public men. These honors so generously given by a State made illustrious by so many distinguished sons, coming from a people possessed of lofty ideals and traditions inherited from a glorious past, should fill to full measurement any man's pride and ambition.

Mr. President, a distinguished writer has well observed that the life of every man is as the wellspring of a stream, whose small beginning is indeed plain to all, but whose ultimate course and destination as it winds through the expanse of years only the Omniscient can discern. Is it to be a nameless brook and will its tiny waters commingling with such others only increase the current of some famed river? Or is it to receive such rills as a sovereign and become a large, magnificent river serving and fertilizing large districts, known far and wide? How forcibly is this exemplified in the life of our departed colleague.

Who could have foretold, watching his early beginning, without wealth, unassisted by influential friends, that the day was not far distant when, with only the assistance of his strong arm and resolute will, he would become the most distinguished citizen of the great Commonwealth of Virginia and one of the most influential statesmen of this Nation? The tiny stream born amid the hills of Albemarle had increased and enlarged its current of life until it became a large, famed river, bearing on its bosom rich treasures for his State and Nation. His large, full life presents an inspiring story of continuous effort and honest endeavor. We first behold him as a boy matriculated at the Virginia Military Institute during the latter years of the Civil War. He insisted upon volunteering for service in the Confederate Army, but being a mere boy and too young for enlistment, his father compromised the matter by permitting him to attend this famous military institute in order to prepare him for future military service. During his attendance here he was most studious, stood high in his classes, and was most observant of the rules of strict discipline required. He was loved and esteemed by his classmates and acquired a leadership in college far beyond what could be expected in one so young. The friendships here formed continued through life, and his boyhood associates during his long political life were ever his most devoted and determined supporters. The faculty of forming firm ties of friendship and esteem was as marked in his boyhood as in his later days. When the military pressure upon the Confederacy during the last years of the war became overwhelming the corps of cadets at the Virginia Military Institute were ordered to join the Confederate Army and participate in the defense of Richmond.

Thus, at the age of 16, Senator MARTIN became a Confederate soldier and served as such until the collapse of the Confederacy. As a mere boy he cheerfully endured without murmur or complaint all the severe privations, hardships, and dangers incident to the last year of this great war. Language is powerless to describe the intense suffering to which the Confederate soldier was subjected during the concluding months of this war. Only those who passed through the terrible experience can form any conception of the awful destitution in food and clothing—an army surrendered because the government it served had become powerless to arm, feed, and clothe it. Senator MARTIN served with the Confederate Army around Richmond during the time immediately preceding and following the evacuation of the city and the final collapse of the Confederacy by the surrender of Gen. Lee. When the end finally came and the Confederate Army was practically disbanded and each soldier driven to the necessity of providing for himself, the means employed by this mere boy, amid the general confusions and enveloping dangers to escape capture and to reach his home, form a remarkable record of adventure, daring, and resourcefulness. It evinced that a short army experience had transformed a boy into a capable and courageous man. He was a fine type of the Confederate youth, returning manfully and hopefully to rebuild a prostrate country and to bind up the bleeding wounds produced by a protracted war and to readjust a social and political system which misfortune had overthrown. The rebuilding and development of the South from the ruins of the Civil War is the most marvelous story in the history of mankind and furnishes an enduring monument to the ability and patriotism of the returned Confederate soldier.

Those soldiers, like Senator MARTIN, made brave from burdens borne and overcome, made patient by sacrifice and long suffering, cherishing to a passion the love of State and section for which they had ventured all, fearlessly faced an adverse future and directed all the energies of heart, mind, and body to restore to their beloved South its former prosperity, greatness, and power. The wonderful work achieved bears everlasting testimony to the industry and genius of the architects. The world never possessed a more self-reliant and resolute class of men than those that directed the destiny of the South immediately following the Civil War.

Mr. President, returning home, Senator MARTIN devoted all his energies to the completion of his education and proper equipment for the practice of law as a profession. He attended the University of Virginia, and was noted for his studious habits and strong, lucid mind. Being thoroughly prepared for the practice of law, he was admitted to the bar and located at Scottsville, in Albemarle County, a small town, where he was born and had resided. By industry, strict attention to business, honesty, and frankness in dealing with clients, and his great ability as a lawyer and advocate, he soon acquired a large and lucrative practice in Albemarle and all the surrounding counties. There were few important cases in his section of the State in which his services were not engaged. He regularly attended the county and circuit courts of more than half a dozen adjacent counties. There is no greater school in the world for the development of clear, logical reasoning, cogent and forcible expression, ready resourcefulness, and efficient management of men than that furnished by the practice of law on country circuits.

Far from elaborate libraries and legal authorities, lawyers were compelled to settle intricate and delicate questions of law by force of their own logical reasoning and argument or effective persuasion to court and jury. Legal contests became a severe clash of mind and not a race of industry in collecting authorities and decisions. From this school have emerged our most eminent lawyers, orators, and statesmen. From it came Patrick Henry, the most eloquent and effective of all American orators; Chief Justice John Marshall, the greatest of all modern judges; also Douglas, Lincoln, Andrew Jackson, Clay, and many others, who constitute our most distinguished and successful of public men. Those who are capable of successfully surviving the severe mental contests here daily encountered become equipped for service in any arena.

Senator MARTIN practiced for years in a circuit composed of counties the members of whose bars were noted for their ability and learning, and he attained great preeminence among the distinguished lawyers with whom he came in contact. His reputation for legal ability and learning was so marked that there was a widespread movement to elect him to the court of appeals, the highest judicial tribunal of our State. I am sure this would easily have been accomplished if he had consented. But for his refusal he would have become a member of this high court, and I am sure would have become distinguished as a great jurist, whose legal acumen and learning would have adorned our judicial history.

Mr. President, while assiduously engaged in the prosecution of his legal profession, like all country lawyers Senator MARTIN took a deep and active interest in politics and became the most potential and controlling factor in the politics of his section of the State. The people of the counties in which he practiced, knowing him intimately and entertaining for him an abiding confidence and esteem, early accepted his leadership, and all through his political career were his enthusiastic supporters and admirers.

From early manhood he took a profound interest in the important public questions agitating his State, and the wise solution of many of these was the product of his brain and bore the impress of his forceful hand. He was largely instrumental in the final settlement of the State debt of Virginia on a basis just and fair to all concerned, and thus brought financial and political peace to the State, which for years had been agitated by unseemly political divisions and unfortunate financial distress.

Modest, unassuming, never seeking publicity, willing to work and let others receive the credit, years before it was generally known he was the guiding spirit in the management of the Democratic Party of Virginia; its wisest and most trusted adviser. The leaders of the party from all sections of the State continuously sought his council and assistance. For years, with no prospect of personal advancement, his time and means were unselfishly and unstintingly given to the service of his party. When Mr. John S. Barbour was elected chairman of the Democratic Party of Virginia, under whose leadership the control of the State was rescued from the opposition party, during the years he held this position Senator MARTIN as a member of the executive committee was his closest, most trusted adviser, the man to whom he looked more than all others for guidance and assistance. Senator MARTIN justly received a part of the great credit accorded his able chieftain for the splendid victories achieved.

When Senator Barbour suddenly died many of the Democratic leaders, who were acquainted with Senator MARTIN'S valuable and unselfish work in behalf of the party and knew his great ability and industry, united with the party's younger element and insisted that Senator MARTIN should become a candidate for the United States Senate as Mr. Barbour's successor. Not until then had the thought of political preferment stirred Senator MARTIN'S aspirations. He consented, and precipitated one of the closest, fiercest political fights ever waged in Virginia, finally winning over Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, a gallant and distinguished Confederate officer, a man of great charm, ability, and deserved popularity. This contest engendered bitterness and produced political divisions which lasted for years. However, when in 1918 Senator MARTIN was reelected for the fifth time to the United States Senate as the unanimous choice of all parties and all the people of Virginia, it was clearly demonstrated that these enmities were obliterated, these party divisions had faded, and that around his strong personality clustered the confidence, esteem, and affection of an entire State. Worth, merit, and service had thus won a great triumph and been properly acclaimed by an appreciative people.

Mr. President, when Senator MARTIN entered the Senate in 1895 the few following years it was composed of men of unusual capacity and distinction. There were times before in its history when it contained a few men of superior merit and eminence, when it possessed towering giants like Clay, Webster, and Calhoun, but never before nor since has the average ability of its Members been surpassed. The Senate was replete with men whose ability, eloquence, and genius would have adorned the legislative body of any age or country. The very mention of their names recalls animated debates, stirring scenes, historic incidents, and important legislation with which they were connected.

Serving in the Senate at the time was Hoar, of Massachusetts, author of innumerable judicial acts, a great lawyer, eloquent and scholarly; Daniel, of Virginia, a great law writer, an orator of marvelous eloquence and polish; Morgan, of Alabama, an encyclopedia of information, possessed of a facility and purity of expression never surpassed; Depew, of New York, able, pleasing, and scintillating with wit and sunshine; Vest, of Missouri, whose every sentence glistened with brilliance, wit, epigram, and sarcasm, the very Rupert of debate; Hale, of Maine, a ready, incisive debater, a most dangerous antagonist; Harris, of Tennessee, the best parliamentarian in the body, sharp and incisive in speech, swift and direct in action, overwhelming in repartee; Blackburn, of Kentucky, genial, lovable, with a copius flow of rich, stirring eloquence; Allison, of Iowa, always calm and composed, logical and persuasive in statement, possessed of unbounded wisdom and prudence; Gorman, of Maryland, most astute manager of men, able and farsighted, leader of the Democratic minority; Aldrich, of Rhode Island, the maker of tariffs, financial expert, whose master mind and skillful hand dominated the Republican majority; Quay, of Pennsylvania, Platt, of New York, Hanna, of Ohio—three of the most masterful political managers this country ever produced; illuminating the Senate with ability and learning were Teller, of Colorado; Davis, of Minnesota; Proctor, of Vermont; Jones, of Arkansas; and many others whom time will not permit me to mention. It was a splendid body of men, comporting themselves with the dignity and reserve expected of the greatest parliamentary body in the world. While the atmosphere of the Senate was cold and austere, yet its proceedings were conducted with a stately decorum, with such profound respect for the Senate's past high traditions, that the assembly inspired universal confidence and esteem.

This was a body in which sham and pretense could make no progress. Entering the Senate, composed of men of such genuine capacity and character, Senator MARTIN wisely pursued the course that soon brought him the esteem and confidence of the Members. He engaged in no dramatic performances, made no spectacular speeches to obtain publicity or notoriety, but scrupulously and conscientiously discharged every duty assigned him by the Senate. He was constant in his attendance at the daily sessions, and an indefatigable and efficient worker upon all the committees to which he was appointed. He early demonstrated that he was a working, useful Senator, who did things and not merely talked about things. He considered a good piece of legislation silently enacted far more desirable than a brilliant, sensational speech delivered. His efforts ran to useful achievements, not to frequent speeches. He believed the Senate was a legislative body and should promptly enact needed legislation, and strongly disapproved of its perversion into an arena for mere oratorical display to enhance the reputation of the speaker or to serve propaganda purposes. When he spoke he addressed himself directly to the pending question; was sincere, earnest, clear, and convincing, and always had the attention of the entire Senate. The Senate realized that when Senator MARTIN was prompted to speak he had something important to say on a vital question, that he had mastered the matter in all its details and far-reaching effects, and that his acknowledged wisdom and prudence demanded his suggestions should receive the most serious consideration. Without oratorical display or ornamentation, he was a most forceful speaker. When interrupted he was ready and effective in rejoinder, and in debate able and skillful. He never used written, prepared speeches, yet his diction was fine, his words aptly selected, and he studiously avoided all superfluity of expression. His speeches were so correct when delivered that he rarely, if ever, subjected them to revision.

He was most courteous and considerate to all Senators. No Senator possessed in a greater degree the universal good will, friendship, and esteem of the entire body than did Senator MARTIN. From the time he entered the Senate until his death he daily increased in influence and reputation. His was an enduring growth, founded on strength and substantial merit. He sought to shun the meteoric reputation obtained by blazing a few days athwart the skies of public attention and then disappearing forever into the infinity of oblivion.

At the time of his death Senator MARTIN was firmly established in the confidence of the Senate and country as one of our ablest public men, one whose advice and direction were wise and invaluable.

Mr. President, as leader of the Democratic majority in the Senate, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Senator MARTIN had imposed upon him a responsibility, and exercised an influence in the prosecution of the war with Germany second only to that of the President of the United States. A larger part of the appropriations necessary for the conduct of the war emanated from his committee; these bills, and many other important measures, indispensable for a successful and vigorous waging of war, passed the Senate under his guidance and direction.

The great work thus accomplished by him can not be overestimated. To secure the prompt passage of these measures, many of which encountered much opposition, required the exercise of great parliamentary skill and leadership. His tact, his ability to reconcile differences, to propitiate opposition, to unite discordant elements in his own party, were never displayed to greater advantage than during this war; and through the exercise of these qualities so preeminently possessed by him many a bill, the passage of which at first seemed hopeless, finally received legislative sanction. His calm patience, his constant persistence, his restrained silence, secured the passage of his measures with marked ease and promptness. The Senate recognized that when he took charge of a bill its passage through the Senate was assured within a reasonable time and with little change and no mutilation. The facility with which he secured the passage of legislation was almost unrivaled. He was never known, as others have been, to destroy his bill by his own interminable debate. He studiously refrained from speech except when it was absolutely necessary.

Mr. President, the heavy burdens and weighty responsibilities imposed upon Senator MARTIN by the important position held by him during the war were greater than his strength could bear. His unceasing work, day and night, without rest or recreation, the continuous pressure upon him as leader of the majority, and the anxieties and responsibilities incident to the position undermined his health and left him at the conclusion of the war a physical wreck. Despite the solemn warning his physicians gave him that unless he desisted from his strenuous life fatal results might ensue, and the constant solicitations of his friends not to destroy his health, he firmly refused in the critical time of the war to abandon his post of duty, and thus unselfishly and patriotically sacrificed his life to public service.

It is by the lives and sacrifice of such men as Senator MARTIN that States and nations progress along correct lines and are made strong and great.

A poet has well expressed it:

What builds a nation's pillars high
And makes it great and strong?
What makes it mighty to defy
The foes that 'round it throng?

Not gold, but only men can make
A nation great and strong;
Men who for truth and honor's sake
Hold still and suffer long.

Brave men who work while others sleep,
Who dare when others sigh;
They build a nation's pillars deep
And lift it to the sky.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I had been two years a Senator when Senator MARTIN entered the Senate. We served together for a quarter of a century, and during that time I came to know him very well, our friendship, although we were of different parties, increasing with each succeeding year. There is a large opportunity for the growth of friendship in the Senate, because, after all, it is here that our waking hours are chiefly passed and our fellow Senators are men whom we see every day and with whom we are engaged steadily and for long periods in a common work for a common purpose.

When the contemporary service of two Senators reaches to 25 years, the constant relationship necessarily draws them very closely together. In this way opportunity was given me to know Senator MARTIN very well, and the more I knew him the more attached I became to him. He had never held public office until he came to the Senate, differing in that respect from most of his colleagues, but from the start he showed his large natural capacity for the important work of legislation, and, wholly apart from the party measures, which, after all, do not occupy most of the time, he proved himself a thoroughly good legislator, following all the business and earnest to secure the best results. He was a man of strong opinions which he sustained with great vigor and persistence. This was shown by his service in the Confederate Army when he was a mere boy, and the same qualities went with him through life. He was a thorough American, devoted to his country and his State, and anything un-American not only met with no sympathy from him but roused his energetic resistance. He was attached to all the traditions of the country, to those policies by which the country has been built up and which are distinctively American. Never were such men more needed than at this precise time, and although he had passed the Psalmist's age, his departure leaves a great gap in the Senate to those who had long served with him.

He was always zealous for the prompt transaction of the public business, and the delays which sometimes characterize the Senate tried his patience severely. He often said to me that there was no subject which a man could not discuss sufficiently in an hour, and he did not suffer long speeches gladly, but he could always be depended upon to drive forward the business of the Government and the legislation necessary to carry that Government on properly and efficiently. In all personal relations he was one of the most agreeable and companionable of men and a good friend if there ever was one. He was above all things loyal. In his early days loyal to his State and to the cause which his State then espoused, proud of her great traditions and of the service which she had rendered throughout our history. He was equally loyal to the United States when he became one of the great body which plays so large a part in the National Government. But his loyalty of disposition did not stop at principles of government or the traditions of the Nation and the State. He was loyal to his friends. Whether they were of the same party as he or not made no difference. If he had once admitted a man to his personal friendship, he was always loyal to him, and I have seen him on the floor of the Senate resent with characteristic warmth a base attack upon a Senator of the opposite party with the same earnestness with which he would have resented an attack upon one of his own political faith. Qualities like these never fail to make a man lovable, and while he had the respect of everyone he also commanded their affection. He rose to be the leader of his party in the Senate, and no man ever filled that responsible position better than he. Such a man whenever death comes can not but be a great loss. It is commonly and probably truthfully said that there are no indispensable men, but there are, nevertheless, those whose place, whether in friendship or in public life, it is very hard to fill and who leave behind them a vacant place of which all men who have been privileged to know them are deeply sensible. The Senate has been deprived by Senator MARTIN'S death of a man who added honor to its long history and who will be sadly missed by the friends whom he made in public life who best knew his worth, his warm affections, and his many admirable and attaching qualities. He worked on despite increasing illness, with no abatement of interest in the questions before him and no diminution in his ruling determination that all duties should be conscientiously performed. Whatever his years, he was always young in mind, in heart, and in feeling. He died as he would have wished to die—in harness, with faculties undimmed, and he faced the end with all the personal courage which had gone with him through life.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, the world will always be the debtor to the State of Virginia for the great men she has given so generously and abundantly to the service of civilization.

Washington, Jefferson, Henry, Madison are the first of that brilliant and imperishable company. And now we have gathered to do honor to another great son of Virginia—THOMAS S. MARTIN.

It is not too much praise to say that in prophetic wisdom, loftiness, and purity of character and exalted patriotism he is without doubt worthy to be classed with those other great characters, now historic, and to whom he was so lately joined.

For THOMAS S. MARTIN grew white and grew poor in the performance of unostentatious, diligent, self-sacrificing service to his country.

There is a wholesome, indeed glorifying, lesson to be learned from his deliberate abandonment of the brilliant professional career, his for the taking, and which promised certain and large returns, in wealth, distinction, and ease, to carry on so faithfully his too often unappreciated public work for his State and his country in this body. Few can fully appreciate or assess the priceless worth of his life and labor for the public welfare.

Throughout it all, gradually growing poorer in worldly goods, he forgot his own advancement, his own loss, in his consuming desire to enrich the world by his efforts. To do his duty in his chosen field, as he saw it, was to him only worth while; that alone was to him priceless. His rugged, healthy, intellectual honesty accepted no compromise where principle was involved. His brains and hands knew no rest when there was work for the Republic to be done.

His loyalty to his convictions, his rare devotion to his many friends, his culture and clean heart, made all who knew him love him and few more than I. His all he gave his country ungrudgingly.

No man could give more; do more.

And we in this Chamber, as do the people of the land, who with us mourn his death, find ourselves powerless, helpless, to fill the unique place he so long held by undisputed title.

Senator MARTIN'S was a nature born to leadership. He was preeminently a leader always, though often without wishing to be. He left his work as leader here reluctantly.

For months with unflinching courage he looked forward to the end, fully realizing his desperate physical condition.

His regret even upon the eve of approaching dissolution was not that he must die, but rather that he must die leaving his task uncompleted, especially that the sort of peace he desired for the world to have must be made by other hands, if at all.

Historians can point to no finer record among English-speaking statesmen, idealized throughout the centuries past, than we have been privileged to see here for ourselves in the character and daily walk of THOMAS STAPLES MARTIN.

His inspiring life and example must in many effective ways persist, and can not fail to stimulate those of us who respect his ideals and love his memory to seek the more earnestly to carry forward the torch that lately fell from our leader's dying hands.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it has been said, evidently by a somewhat misanthropic person, that human glory is but dust and ashes, and that we mortals are no more than shadows in pursuit of shadows.

But who can say that a man who has lived an upright and useful life for more than 72 years; who has devoted nearly a quarter of a century to the service of the public; who, like Abou Ben Adhem of old, has loved his fellow men, and has been fair and square in his dealings with them—who can say that he has lived in vain, and that when he passes to the great beyond he has left behind only dust and ashes, and shadows vanished and forgotten?

Such a man, possessing the qualities I have enumerated, was our beloved colleague, Senator MARTIN. An American through and through, a devoted worker in the interest of every cause which he believed to be beneficial to his country, and a man of splendid judgment as well, his departure meant a great loss to us personally and to the Senate officially.

All of us here recognized the fact that he was endowed with qualities such as are possessed by all men who follow political activities as a sort of "second nature." His ability to make and keep strong friendships, and to inspire and retain the respect of all who knew him, both friends and mere acquaintances, were among his many splendid attributes.

THOMAS STAPLES MARTIN was born at Scottsville, Albemarle County, Va., on July 29, 1847, where he lived until about 10 years ago. He then bought an estate near Charlottesville, which was his home until death claimed him.

In his youth he was a member of the battalion of cadets of the Virginia Military Institute, and he took part in the military service of the Confederate States, participating in the Battle of New Market and other engagements.

He began practicing law in the year 1869, and during the remainder of his life he devoted much time to that profession.

For more than 24 years he served the people of his State and of the country at large as a Member of the United States Senate, where his usefulness was continuously recognized and greatly appreciated by all of us who have had the honor of serving with him.

As we know, his seniority, as well as his ability and his capacity for hard work, finally brought him to the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations, where, during the war period, the great burdens of the country's money problems were constantly present. Senator MARTIN'S responsibilities then became far greater than his physical endurance; but, regardless of the advice of friends and physicians, he remained on duty throughout that troublous period of our country's history and until stricken by the serious illness which five months later caused his untimely death.

As a matter of fact, he gave his life to his country in time of war just as our brave soldiers did who made the supreme sacrifice on the battle fields of France.

Such service, while there is nothing dramatic or sensational about it, was of inestimable worth to our Government. Senator MARTIN, a superior man by nature, had also the great assets of long experience as a legislator, years of devoted study of his country's needs, his memory of the lessons taught us by the Spanish-American War, which occurred during his first term as a Member of this body, and a sense of conscientious devotion to duty such as one does not find so keenly developed in the hearts of all public servants. He did not work for name or fame, for gratitude or glorification, but to fulfill his patriotic obligation to his Government to the best of his ability.

I lost a good and valued friend when Senator MARTIN was taken from us, and I shall always cherish in memory the pleasure and satisfaction I derived from service with him during our many years together as fellow committeemen and fellow Senators.

When the great day of judgment comes, the roll call of the State of Virginia will carry the names of many honored and illustrious dead. But present and future generations of the Old Dominion's children will hold no name in higher esteem than that of her beloved son, THOMAS STAPLES MARTIN.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I deem it a privilege to be permitted to say a few words in memory of Virginia's great Senator whom we have gathered to honor to-day.

During the turmoil of life and in the midst of the struggles and controversies of the Senate, we see as through a glass darkly. We are not always able to measure correctly the characteristics, the abilities, and the services of a public man. When death comes, however, and we look back upon the scenes through which we have passed, a clearer light is thrown upon the individual and upon his services, and certain qualities stand out in bold relief. With Senator MARTIN it seems to me to be peculiarly true that his great value as a public man was due in a large respect to the strength of what we call the homely virtues.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has delivered a beautiful tribute to his late colleague, and has analyzed his character in a most impressive way. What seemed to me to be the commanding quality in Senator MARTIN'S character was his strength, and with that I include his courage, his steadiness of purpose, his determination to do his duty.

In these days, Mr. President, when the people of the United States are perhaps confronted with a danger of shirking duty, the services and the life of Senator MARTIN stand as a splendid example.

It appears to me that one of the consequences of this war has been a sort of moral let down in the Senate, a disposition quite general on the part of each individual to look after himself, to do as little as he can and get as much as he may. Senator MARTIN'S life was laid along lines exactly contrary to that. He gave up more than 25 years of that life, more than a quarter of a century in time, to the service of his State, the service of his people, the service of the United States; and when I say he gave it up I am only echoing what has already been said, that his life here in Washington was one of continuous, unremitting toil and industry.

Think of the countless hours he spent in hard committee work; think of the endless days he spent in struggles in this Chamber; think of the thousands of trips he made to the departments here in Washington on public business or representing his constituents; think of all that he did for others during those 25 years, and you will realize that his life was an unselfish one; that it was a life of service and not a life of self-interest and self-promotion.

As has already been said, his work was characterized by a strict adherence to his sense of duty. He had a contempt for anything in the nature of a public shirk. He was brief and to the point. He was quick in reaching his decisions, as well as careful, and he was firm in adhering to them. He had a contempt for insincerity and hypocrisy. He had no use for the insincere man. He was direct and open and frank.

Mr. President, Senator MARTIN represented in an unusual degree a link between the past and the present. In this body there remain only a very few who occupy that position to-day. His life went back to the days of the Civil War, and it came forward to the days of the reconstituted American Republic. He represented the old as well as the new, and not many with that experience still remain in public life.

Mr. President, it was my privilege to count Senator MARTIN as my friend, and there are few men whom I have known whose friendship was more sincere, more disinterested, or more steadfast.

Senator MARTIN represented an element of great value in the public service of the United States. He represented a conservative element. The service he rendered to his country, however, was not confined to the exercise of a conservative judgment, but he became conspicuous and active, as his colleague has shown, in pushing to passage in the Senate the remarkable list of constructive acts of the present administration, done very largely under his leadership.

In mourning to-day the death of this great representative from Virginia the Senate does well to pay tribute to his memory. The great State of Virginia has lost one of her eminent men, one of her men who will be known in history, and the Senate has lost one of its most valuable Members, as his work here during a quarter of a century abundantly testifies.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, THOMAS S. MARTIN became a Member of the Senate on the 4th of March, 1895. Fourteen other Senators began their service in the Senate at the same time. Of this number all but four are dead, and of the living one is still in the Senate; and of the dead the following-named six died in the service of the Senate: Augustus O. Bacon, Stephen B. Elkins, John H. Gear, William J. Sewell, Benjamin R. Tillman, and THOMAS S. MARTIN, who was the last of the number to die and was the longest in the service of the Senate.

In the face of such a list of our departed associates, all men of high character and pronounced ability, we can not avoid reflecting upon the transitory character of human life and human activity, even among the bravest and the best. But while the span of life and activity may be brief and appear perishable, the result of the useful and good done and accomplished survives, though not always and for the moment visible, and is the chief legacy of our existence.

There is in the moral and intellectual world no broader or nobler field of usefulness than in a legislative body such as the United States Senate, which has jurisdiction not only over domestic affairs but also, to some extent, over foreign affairs.

Legislators approach their duties from two different angles and on two different theories. One class seem to have no pronounced opinions on any important public question, but seek to be guided solely by what they conceive to be the opinion of the majority of the people they represent, without any regard to the intrinsic merits of the question. In other words, they court what they regard as most popular, even if their own judgment tells them it is unwise. Another class take a more serious and conservative view of their duty. While they are not oblivious of the views of the public, the masses of the people, if you please, yet they feel that it is their duty to exercise their own best judgment on great public questions, and if their judgment runs counter to public opinion for the time being they feel that it is their duty not only to act rightly and justly and according to their best judgment, but also to aim to instruct and to lead public opinion into the right channels. In other words, that they should not only be real leaders and guides in legislation but that they should also be real guides and instructors for their constituency. The masses of the public may sometimes, through misinformation or lack of information, go astray. In such a case it is the duty of the representative to give his constituency the necessary information and to guide them into true and just premises and conclusions.

The class I have first mentioned is, in the main, of a more modern type than the other class, and seems to some extent to be an outcome of the evolution that has taken place in recent years in our systems of nominations and elections.

Most of our prominent and leading legislators of former times, of bygone days, appear to have belonged to the second class to which I have referred. These great men of the past did not regard themselves as mere legislative automatons, to register temporary fluctuations of the so-called public pulse. They felt that first of all their constituents were entitled to the exercise of their best judgment and opinion on all great public questions, that this was an important part of their legislative functions. While they were willing to hear all and to counsel with all; yet, like jurymen, they must render their own judgment upon the law and facts of the case in hand and act accordingly. More than this, if it turned out that there was a conflict between their views and the views of their constituents founded on ignorance or misapprehension, then it was their duty to instruct, educate, and guide their constituents into the right channels and proper conclusion. The finest and greatest example of statesmen of this school is found in the men who framed our Federal Constitution. They formulated that great instrument according to their own opinions and upon their own judgment, without listening to clamor or voices from the outside; and when their work was assailed, after its completion, feeling that they were right, they defended it boldly, heroically, and effectively in speech and press against all assaults, and in the end secured its adoption after a great educational campaign.

Senator MARTIN belonged, by mental and moral equipment, to this school of legislators and statesmen. He came from good Virginia stock; had a liberal education in his native State, both of a civil and military character; became a good, sound, and reliable lawyer; and, above all, proved himself independent, trustworthy, fearless, reliable, and of sound judgment, both in private and public affairs. When he entered the Senate he came mentally and morally well equipped for the task, and he assumed the work of legislation in a serious and conservative spirit, determined to bear his full share of the legislative burden and to exercise his best judgment on all public questions.

Experience has long ago made it manifest to us who have been a long time in the Senate, as well as to others, that legislative activity is, in the main, exercised through two groups or classes of Senators. The members of one class are faithful and industrious in their committee work and in formulating and preparing legislative measures for the action of the Senate, while not as a rule participating to any great extent in the debates, beyond giving brief explanations and answering questions. Members of the other class give little or no attention to committee work, but devote their attention to the debate and discussion of legislative measures and public questions, elucidating and expounding the same from all angles and standpoints, and in this manner advising their colleagues as to the merits of measures that may have been overlooked by the committees, and above all keeping the public in touch with what is pending and going on in the halls of legislation. Members of this class, owing to the character of their work, are rather more in the limelight than those of the former class.

Senator MARTIN, in his legislative activity, belonged, in the main, to the first of these groups. He was a most faithful and industrious attendant of all meetings of committees of which he was a member, rendering in all such cases most valuable and efficient service. I can bear witness to this fact, for I was associated with him on one of the important committees of the Senate during nearly all his service in this body. He was one of the most energetic of committee workers—fearless, thorough, and self-contained. And while his greatest task was in committee work, he was also a good debater. Measures that he had in charge on the floor of the Senate he would expound in an instructive and convincing manner, never failing to meet all questions propounded to him in a candid and convincing spirit.

He was, above all things, fearless and independent. With him it was always a question as to what was for the best of our country. Public clamor, if not based on justice and righteousness, made scant impression on him, and while he was beyond a question devoted to his State, yet his loyalty to the Union, to our common country and its interests, was ever uppermost and foremost in his thought and labors. He was emphatically a most pronounced exponent of the new South. He was actuated by the sentiment—

> Let the dead past bury its dead.
> Act, act in the living present,
> Heart within and God o'erhead.

He was not given to what I term mere academic oratory or debate. He was content to confine his discussion to pending or proposed measures, and never indulged in mere political oratory. As a debater he was instructive, sincere, earnest, and convincing, and as such often proved a balm on the flights of oratory of an opponent. He was a pronounced and determined enemy of all shams and of all camouflage. Neither was he a man of lofty airs or high pretentions. He was a plain, hard-working, and most industrious Senator, who was content to do his work and allotted task without the blare of trumpets and beating of cymbals. He aimed at practical and wholesome results, and to this he devoted his energy and his life. A Senate composed of such men as Senator MARTIN would never go far astray and would be more likely to formulate and enact needed measures for the welfare of the country than a mere galaxy of orators, however gifted they might be as such. Mere oratory may lubricate the legislative wheels, but it hardly ever furnishes the real material or the real labor.

During the last year of the Civil War Senator MARTIN was a cadet at the Virginia Military Institute, and as such served in the Confederate forces during the closing days of the war. He and Senator BANKHEAD, who soon followed him in death, were the last survivors of the Confederate armies in this Chamber. Two soldiers of the Union armies are still in our midst, both advanced in years. When they are finally mustered out, which can not be far off, this Chamber will have no longer in its ranks any representative of those mighty hosts which more than 50 years ago so heroically and bravely struggled for supremacy. While the cause of the Union won, the glory of the soldier, Union and Confederate alike, survives. They were all Americans, and all fought as only Americans can fight; and their descendants who fought in the late World War have demonstrated that they could fight as bravely and as heroically, side by side and shoulder to shoulder, as their ancestors did on opposite sides in the days of the Civil War.

Virginia has been represented by many great statesmen and great orators in the United States Senate, men of great renown and famous throughout the land, but none of them has rendered more faithful or more efficient service as a legislator than Senator MARTIN. His work may not have been of that meteoric character, as was the work of some of his predecessors, but in substantial, far-reaching, and beneficial results the burden he bore and the task he performed stand second to none. Virginia can well be proud of such a legislative record of faithfulness to public duty and public trust.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not rise to eulogize but to pay a loving tribute to the memory of a departed friend.

When I entered this body, now over 19 years ago, I found Senator MARTIN here. There was then in the Senate a galaxy of distinguished men, most of whom have since passed away, but whose names are indissolubly linked with the history of the Nation.

Already the then junior Senator from Virginia, just entering upon his second term, had found his way into the inner circles of this distinguished group, and had become a potential factor in the work and deliberations of the Senate. During all the intervening years of his service here his influence, never waning, grew steadily and continuously, finally culminating in his selection to the position of leader of this body, which position he held at the time of his death.

It goes without saying that no man could retain for 24 years the prominent position Senator MARTIN held in this body without being a man of high qualities both of mind and heart. During all these years he enjoyed the full confidence and esteem of the entire membership of this body, and I am sure I can safely say no Senator enjoyed greater or more universal popularity with his associates. Though his manner sometimes seemed brusque, all recognized it as the brusqueness of a direct and frank nature rather than of ill temper, for no one who knew him well, or came in close touch with him, could fail to discover the kindness and cordiality of his disposition and the innate gentleness of his spirit.

Senator MARTIN, though a convincing speaker and a forceful and resourceful debater, was not an orator. In the Senate he seldom spoke, and never long. Indeed, he seemed rather to shrink from forensic conflict, but he did not falter in this respect if he thought it necessary and expedient in the accomplishment of his purpose, or in the support or furtherance of the interest or position for which he stood, and when he did speak it was because he had something worth while to say, and he said it with a directness and forcefulness that challenged attention and put his adversaries upon their mettle. All of his speeches were characterized by directness, and were never obscure, either in statement or implication.

His industry was remarkable and unremitting. During his whole service in the Senate he was a close attendant upon its sittings. Generally, except when in attendance upon the important committees of which he was a member, he was to be found in his seat. His unflagging interest, energy, and industry in the discharge of every duty and function of his great office were notable and exceptional.

His equipoise was splendid. He was always steady and calm. With tireless patience and industry he pursued the even tenor of his way, giving to every public matter committed to his charge and in which he was interested the most thorough study and consideration; and thus it came about that no man in this body was better equipped than he for the work before him.

Beyond doubt the possession of these high qualities and traits measurably contributed to his usefulness, standing, and position in the Senate; but they were not and could not, of course, have been the main source of his great and long-sustained influence and power in a body which appraises and measures its membership with impartial exactitude. His great influence and success as a Senator and statesman was chiefly due to his open-minded frankness, his moral and intellectual integrity and courage, and his sound judgment and level headedness.

I know of no man who has served in the Senate since I have been here whose counsel and advice was more highly esteemed by his associates and carried more weight than his. "What does MARTIN think?" was an inquiry often made by Senators in connection with their discussions of difficult and mooted questions. The unusual esteem in which his associates in the Senate held his judgment and advice was not due altogether to the confidence entertained in his ability, though that was great, to analyze difficult and abstruse problems, and reach a sound conclusion; but it was in large part the result of their confidence in his moral and intellectual integrity and courage. They knew he was as sincere, courageous, and honest in thought as in action. They knew the opinions which he declared were those which he had reached, and that they were devoid of all elements of subterfuge or dissimulation.

Somewhat brusque in manner, at times seeming a little callous, his spirit was gentle, and his heart beat in unison with that of his fellow man, and nothing gave him keener pleasure than to serve them. No man possessed in a higher degree the spirit of patriotism and service than he. He was not an ambitious man, and cared but little for money; and it was not ambition or lust for power or gain that caused him to devote the best part of his life to the service of his State, his country, and his fellowman.

Thus it came about that the fruitage of his life, the reward of his toils and struggles, were not the things that appeal to selfishness, but the things that were helpful to his fellowmen and his country. While he left but little of this world's goods, though he wrought constantly and had lived frugally, he left what is infinitely more to be desired—a record of splendid and useful achievement, an honorable name unstained, and an enduring sense of gratitude in the hearts of his countrymen.

It is gratifying to know that when the end came he passed peacefully away, and that "like a shadow thrown softly and sweetly from a passing cloud, death fell upon him." It is comforting to his associates here and to those who loved him to have the assurance of our religion that, though dead, he still liveth. "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and if He live I know I, too, shall live."

The day has come, not gone;
The sun has risen, not set;
His life is now beyond
The reach of death or change;
Not ended, but begun.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, we form our judgments and opinions of men we do not know from the things we hear and read of them. This opinion and judgment is more or less molded by our views of questions we are interested in or by our personal bias. This leads to wrong and oftentimes unjust impressions. The things we hear or read may come from a prejudiced source. They may appeal to our own prejudices, partisan or otherwise, and this often leads us into grievous error. I have known men of national prominence toward whom the popular view was wholly wrong and very unjust. At any rate, a personal acquaintance with them changed my view, and proved to me that they were the reverse of what they were said to be and what the public believed them to be.

To a degree this was my experience with Senator MARTIN. I had met him only casually before I entered the Senate. I had read more or less of him and had seen various references to his work and views in the papers. My impression was not a favorable one. I thought him to be a man of narrow, partisan views, of rather unscrupulous methods, of reactionary tendencies, and what is commonly called a "machine man," with all that that implies. How wholly wrong I was in this opinion I had the pleasure of telling him before he passed away; and I am glad to give this testimony for the RECORD, not only as a proper tribute to him but in the hope that it may cause some one to be slow in passing adverse judgment upon those they do not know, and especially upon public men whose duty it is to consider carefully all phases of the questions upon which they must act and then do what they believe is for the best interests of their country.

I was not long in this body till I became aware of the universal esteem in which Senator MARTIN was held by his colleagues, regardless of party, and those who had known him longest seemed to esteem him highest. It was not long until my views and impressions about him began to change. I looked for those things my impressions led me to expect. I did not find them. He was open, frank, fair, honest, and just in his dealings. Rather brusque in manner, he was withal kind, considerate, and tender. He was firm and positive in his opinions, but you instinctively felt that he was honest and conscientious in his views. He was a strong partisan, but, above all, he was a patriot, and whatever he did was done for his country's ultimate good and with a belief that the action he took was for his country's good.

He was often referred to as a "reactionary" or a "standpat" or a "conservative" Democrat. He was so in the sense that every honest, conscientious, and patriotic man stands firmly for what he thinks is right and refuses to follow what he believes to be wrong. Senator MARTIN may not have agreed with many of the proposals advanced for the uplift of the people, but what he did believe in and the measures he stood for he thought were for their good, and he was as honest and sincere in his opinions as those who disagreed with him. He may not have agreed with those few who would have the Government help and support its citizens, but he stood for and believed in those things that he thought would best promote their welfare. He was an honest man, a faithful legislator, a consistent partisan, a devoted husband, and an intensely patriotic American. He did his duty faithfully as he saw it, and reflected great credit upon the State that honored him so long. His life and work will be a guide and inspiration to those who would serve their State and their country. To us who were favored with a more intimate knowledge of his kindly, genial nature, his sterling mental and moral qualities, and his tender, gentle attributes, his memory will be a precious heritage.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, little can be added to the splendid eulogies thus far pronounced.

If I were to attempt to describe in a phrase the chief characteristic of our friend and former associate, Hon. THOMAS STAPLES MARTIN, I would speak of it as his intense devotion to duty as it was given to him to see it. Loyalty was his watchword. He was loyal to himself, to his family, to his friends, to his State, and to the Nation. True it is that as a boy he cast his lot with his native State in the Civil War, no doubt through a sense of duty to the State of his nativity. The war having ended, the allegiance which he gave to the stars and bars was transferred to the Stars and Stripes. The country was reunited and he was a part of it.

After the war he completed his preliminary education, read law, early rose to a high rank in his profession, and at the time of his death was the first citizen of the Old Dominion State. For five consecutive times Virginia honored him by election to the United States Senate. No other man has ever been so distinguished by the State of Virginia. Only three sitting Members of the Senate have thus been honored by their respective States—the senior Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. LODGE; the senior Senator from Wyoming, Mr. WARREN; and the senior Senator from Minnesota, Mr. NELSON. Only 12 other Senators, if I am rightly informed, in the entire history of the United States have been thus favored by their respective States with five or more elections:

Hon. John T. Morgan, of Alabama; Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois; Hon. William B. Allison, of Iowa; Hon. Eugene Hale and Hon. William P. Frye, of Maine; Hon. Thomas Benton and Hon. Francis M. Cockrell, of Missouri; Hon. John P. Jones, of Nevada; Hon. John Sherman, of Ohio; Hon. Nelson W. Aldrich, of Rhode Island; Hon. Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont; and Hon. Jacob H. Gallinger, of New Hampshire.

To state merely the fact that Senator MARTIN was thus elected and reelected to the greatest legislative body in the world is conclusive evidence of the high character of his service and of the abiding affection which his people entertained for him. Surely he was not without honor in his own country.

He did not reach his goal of success by some meteoric flight of fancy. Rather it was an arduous path he trod. When he came to the "hill of difficulty" he climbed it. He did not go around it. Nothing daunted, nothing discouraged him. His was the genius of hard work, added to native ability of a high order. He labored, he did not idle. His eyes were on his work, not on the clock. He thought, he did not dream. His energies were devoted to construction, not to destruction. By his work his colleagues knew him, not by his words.

No honest man ever questioned his integrity or that in all he did or thought he was ever guided by anything but high purposes.

In the nine years of my service in the Senate I know of no one who surpassed him in effectiveness as a legislator or in his consecration to the duties of his high office.

In his legislative work, as in his private life, he took counsel of fact, not of fiction. With him doctrines were not true, because they were new, nor were they false because they happened to be old. As new questions arose he looked forward and took pride in our civic development, but in doing so he did not lose sight of the guiding wisdom of the past. He was a man of vision, not of visions; hence some of the opposition which his course inspired. Senator MARTIN'S feet were always on the ground, and his head was never above the clouds. He was not given to much speech making. Few pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are filled with his utterances. But the United States Statutes at Large, and particularly the great appropriation acts, will always remain as monuments to his industry, his intelligence, and his conservative regard for the financial welfare of his fellow countrymen.

Senator MARTIN'S face and figure were not familiar to the great body of the people, simply because he did not frequent public places; but his colleagues and his constituents always knew that they could find him either in his office or in his home. Devotion to duty was the secret of his great success.

Now that he is gone, who that ever knew him can ever forget him or the profit derived from his wise counsel and his well-poised mind?

No one ever found him obtrusive in the presentation of his views, but with what firmness and frankness he always spoke. Few men in our legislative halls will be more missed than he. He had passed the threescore years and ten, and necessarily we could not expect him to linger much longer among these scenes of his great labors; but because of his well-stored mind and his broad experience we were wont to go to him for counsel and guidance. Now that he is gone we shall miss him more than words can tell.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, a tall oak has fallen; a monarch of the forest cut down. Trite though the analogy be, it fittingly conveys the thought of the Virginia people when THOMAS STAPLES MARTIN passed away. I wish that I might aptly express in words their high estimate of their fallen chief and the degree of their faith in his capabilities and the extent of their pride in his achievements, thus interpreting in the language of oral speech Senator MARTIN'S lofty qualities of mind and heart and ideals as they appealed to those who knew him best and loved him most. Yet, in a lively recognition of my own limitations, I apprehend that the theme can be done scant justice at my hands.

The tidings of Senator MARTIN'S death affected the people of Virginia with a consciousness of a real personal loss, producing public sorrow in a degree that has been rarely witnessed at the passing of a public man. The scene at his funeral service when he was laid to rest attested with pathetic eloquence the deep-seated, affectionate loyalty of those who had given their faith to him in the early period of his political prominence and who had followed him throughout the intervening years. There, at the open graveside of their dead chief, they foregathered, these stalwarts, the old guard of the Martin clans. From city and from countryside they came to pay the last tribute of their devotion to the man who had led them to victory in every political battle that has been waged in Virginia for nearly three decades. And there these men gave compelling manifestation of their deep and lasting attachment for the grim, resolute, masterful leader they had so newly lost. The spectacle then presented I shall not soon forget, nor the thoughts to which it gave rise, in respect to the tenacious hold which Mr. MARTIN had established upon the abiding affection as well as the confidence and admiration of the people whom he served.

With almost exactitude, the years of Senator MARTIN'S life measured the distance between two epochs of history. In the first flush of youth he had a place in the ranks of that immortal battalion of the Virginia Military Institute—those young cadets who, with Spartan heroism, endured their baptism of fire at New Market just when the Civil War was being brought near to its conclusion and the beleaguered Confederacy hastening to its fall. Then, after nearly threescore years of ceaseless activity, we see him, but yesterday it seems, standing in this forum as the wise, sagacious, trusted leader in the war cause of his country, against the aggressions of European autocracy; thus in early youth emerging from the strife of Civil War and closing his earthly career in ripe old age at the ending of a World War. The circumstance is both interesting and suggestive. In an important sense it reminds one of the effect of stern environment in developing the character, shaping the career, and molding the destiny of this distinguished Virginian. It recalls the larger demands and opportunities for service and achievement which summoned men of MARTIN'S generation to the work of building anew and adjusting to fundamentally changed conditions the political, economic, and social fabric of a defeated and wasted land, of a sadly stricken and sorely menaced civilization. Senator MARTIN'S first call as he neared the entrance to active life was a call to patriotic service. The last call was the same; and both translated the terms of public stress and crisis. It is known with what consecration he answered; how nobly his task was begun with his cadet comrades in Virginia; and how as well ended here in the Senate of the United States. These two chapters in Mr. MARTIN'S life—the introduction and the conclusion, together with those which lay between, covering more than a quarter of a century of service in this body—are now being recalled by the people of his native State with emotions in which exultation and sorrow blend.

Senator MARTIN was born in Albemarle County, Va., 72 years ago. It was there that he started out upon the building of his fortunes without other aid or influence than that derived from his own courageous purpose to be of some account in the world. And, verily, he builded well, if to be coveted is the structure of a human life securely established upon foundations of wide, enduring usefulness. It is not difficult to suppose that, when entering the province of his manhood, Senator MARTIN caught the message that there was both room and need for him in public affairs; that he felt charged with a distinct mission to serve, and by service to aid in saving, repairing, and constructing anew a land which had been wrecked by the desolating sweep of war. Men who were not of that generation can not understand the difficulties and dangers which either provoked to mute despair or prompted to high and heroic endeavor. Those who did live through the perilous time know best how to appreciate the motives which animated men of the school so fitly typed by Mr. MARTIN and to measure the great service which they wrought.

It was due to his participation in the work of enabling Virginia to stand upon her feet again and advance to the higher and happier state which lay ahead that Senator MARTIN begun to develop the attributes of astute leadership. In the first place, there was something about his personality that seemed naturally to draw men to him and to hold them fast. The increasing years of his public activity steadily added to the number of his friends and admirers, so that at the time of his death he held his post of party leader unchallenged from any source. Within my knowledge no man in Virginia since the days of John Warwick Daniel had an influence more complete and controlling than that of Senator MARTIN. Nor is the reason difficult to apprehend. The Virginia people know it well.

Mr. MARTIN was trained in the school of politics under men rarely experienced in the arts of thorough, searching organization. He undertook party work when Virginia was passing through the gravest, most dramatic period of her history. He brought to his task an intense ardor of spirit, a great love for his State, a calm grimness of purpose, an exceptionally clear, penetrating mind, and an unusual knowledge of men. The natural order of things was therefore witnessed. Mr. MARTIN advanced stage by stage to station of authority and power among the prevailing individual political forces of the State.

Until the early nineties, however, Mr. MARTIN held aloof from the rôle of aspirant for political preferment. He was content to labor and to wait until the darkness of a long political night had gone forever and Virginia's safety was assured. With that happy consummation, he appeared as a candidate for the first office he had ever sought and the only office he ever held. He was elected to the United States Senate, and for 26 years, without intermission, retained his seat in this body.

I dwell thus upon Mr. MARTIN's genius for organization as expressed in his political career and upon the service which he rendered in the field of Virginia politics because these things served as the real background of his life; because they revealed the most forceful and compelling traits of his mind and character; because they the more clearly disclose the vehicle through which he translated the exalted aspiration into the thing achieved. But it must not be thought that the dead Virginia Senator was enabled to score in his every political battle solely by virtue of his extraordinary success as a party tactician or organizer. This was not the case. His talents would have counted in vain but for his sensitive recognition of the duties and obligations incident to public service. He was of modest mien and even speech, except when strongly provoked to talk in an emphatic fashion. This he could do unmistakably.

Mr. MARTIN was not of the showy order; he was inclined to regard pityingly those who were. Nor was he skilled in the ways and wiles of the cheap politician. He was big and broad, compelling the respect of his adversaries and never impairing the confidence of his adherents. He never forgot a friend nor a friendly act. His conception of public duty comprehended the minor details as well as the larger and more important features of his trust, and from no Virginian could come a request requiring his attention that would suffer the slightest neglect or indifference at his hands. So being faithful in service, loyal to supporters, true to trust, and strong of intellect, Mr. MARTIN continued to grow in the stature of usefulness from the time he entered the Senate until, with health worn and shattered by the last years of his arduous labors here, he left his seat, never to return.

It is not needful that I should speak of Mr. MARTIN's service in this body. The record speaks for him, although it does not nearly disclose the full extent and scope of his fruitful activity. In committee room, especially as either chairman or ranking member of the great Appropriations Committee, in conference and in council, my lamented predecessor accomplished most of the large sum of usefulness which characterized his labors as a Senator. This much is known: Senator MARTIN was an effective leader on the floor of this body. He marshaled his forces and directed their movements with ability and sagacity. Considering the manifold perplexities with which his post was beset, the many difficulties that obtruded to add infinitely to the burden of his responsibilities, the extraordinary crises in national and world affairs which were precipitated just prior to America's entry into the war, continuing throughout that disastrous conflict, and into the period immediately following the signing of the armistice, Mr. MARTIN, who was in command on this side of the Chamber, measured up to the standards of level-headed, prudent, constructive leadership. Indeed, because of the appalling strain upon the resources of his mind and body, consequent upon the so terrific ordeal, the Virginia Senator's life was probably shortened by many years, making it so that he sacrificed and fell because ready to give his all for his country's sake.

It is inspiring to think that when this grizzled chieftain was making last preparations to answer "ad sum" to the roll call of the Master he had thus rounded out a career of enduring distinction; that from a reserved, unassuming entrance upon the deliberations of a great legislative tribunal he had, by sheer force of his own merit, risen slowly but surely to the eminence of majority leadership in full cooperation with the administration and relied on by the President as a source of support and guidance in the halls of legislation while the Republic was being rocked to its foundations by the convulsions of war. Virginians rightly take satisfaction in the reflection that this was so; that at a time when men of great capacity and militant patriotism and fine courage were most needed in the legislative department of the Government their State gave to the upper branch of Congress the leader of the dominating party.

Senator MARTIN interpreted an order of Americanism which was stalwart in genus, vibrant in patriotism, robust in fidelity, impatient of aught that smacked of timeserving or cant. Greatness is a relative term; men are wont to employ it with a carelessness and lack of discrimination so crude that the tribute which it is really designed to convey often becomes obscure and bedimmed in meaning. But, guarding carefully my words, it seems to me that elements of greatness may readily be imputed to Senator MARTIN, if greatness can be measured in the scale of service or by the test of the sum of the things which he did, the ends which he achieved, the purposes which he wrought, during the time in which it pleased God that he should walk the ways of usefulness here on earth.

In his private and domestic relations of life Mr. MARTIN exemplified those lofty ideals which appeal directly to what is best and highest in human standards. He was the fond, devoted husband, the tenderly solicitous and affectionate father, the good neighbor, the public-spirited citizen.

Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Senator MARTIN, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 12, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 10, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, who holdest in the hollow of Thy hand the destinies of men and of nations, give us as individuals and as a people religious grace and strength to meet the strenuous and exacting duties of life, through sunshine and cloud, through calm and storm, through sorrows and joys.

Let Thy healing touch be upon the Member of this House sorely stricken.

Help us to conserve our physical and intellectual energies, that our service may be lengthened and our work be acceptable in Thy sight and redound to the good of our fellows. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BUDGET OF THE BRITISH NAVY.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by putting in the RECORD the official statement of the English Admiralty, containing the budget and plans for the English Navy for the next fiscal year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. His remarks about what?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I merely wanted to extend my remarks by putting into the RECORD an official statement of the English Admiralty on the budget and plans for the English Navy for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I was asking is what remarks you are extending?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The statement made by the First Lord of the Admiralty of England.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is all of it, is it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is all of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa in what way that will help and assist us?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It will show that England has reduced her expenses down to nearly a prewar basis.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that to shame us for not further reducing ours?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I hope it will have some effect in further reducing ours.

Mr. BLANTON. If it will, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the statement referred to:

[From the Times, Tuesday, Mar. 16, 1920.]

NAVY ESTIMATES—MR. LONG'S STATEMENT—£84,372,300.

The statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty, explanatory of the navy estimates, 1920–21, was issued last night as a white paper (Cmd. 619).

The estimates for 1920–21 amount to £84,372,300 as compared with 1919–20 estimates, together with the supplementary estimate, amounting to £157,528,810.

This total provides for—

(a) The liquidation of the terminal expenses of the war, which consist of expenditure already incurred or to which the Admiralty are committed, estimated at £19,077,000;

(b) Separation allowances, estimated to cost £3,915,000;

(c) Expenditure of abnormal or quasi war character arising out of temporary obligations, such as the maintenance of an adequate force in the eastern Mediterranean and the Black Sea until peaceful conditions are reestablished in those regions, estimated to cost about £500,000; and

(d) The maintenance during the coming year of a fleet of the minimum strength which, in the opinion of the Board of Admiralty, can be regarded as providing in present circumstances for the security of the Empire.

Owing to the great increase of salaries, pay, wages, and pensions, and in the prices of materials of every description since 1914, a direct comparison with the prewar estimates is of little value. An analysis, however, of the gross expenditure of £96,490,181 estimated to be incurred in 1920–21 shows that it can be approximately divided into—

(a) Nonrecurrent war liabilities or terminal charges	£19, 077, 000
(b) Recurrent expenditure, due to war conditions; e. g., increases in prices and in rates of wages, pensions, etc., and separation allowance	40, 023, 000
(c) Normal expenditure on basis of prewar rates and prices	37, 489, 981

On this basis, the following comparison of the gross estimate for 1914–15 with the gross estimate for 1920–21 can be made:

1914–15.
Gross estimate		£53, 573, 261
Deduct amount included for new construction		18, 373, 000
		35, 200, 261
1920–21.
Gross estimate		96, 590, 181
Deduct war liabilities, including new construction	£19, 077, 000
Deduct recurrent expenditures due to war conditions	40, 023, 200
		59, 100, 200
		37, 489, 981

The increase of approximately £2,290,000 over the provision required in 1914–15 is due mainly to the following causes:

The grant of clothing allowances to men of the fleet.

Provision of larger hospital ships.

The extension of scientific research and of technical training.

Reduction in the hours worked by the industrial staff.

Increase in noneffective charges.

The above comparison takes no account of the greater extent to which stocks will be used without replacement during 1920–21, as compared with 1914–15. Against this, however, must be set the fact that a considerable expenditure will be incurred in 1920–21 in building up reserves of victualing and clothing stores, medical stores, oil fuel, and in the provision of new types of shell and ammunition consequent on experience gained in the early part of the war.

The number that we propose shall be voted in vote A for the maximum number of the personnel of the fleet to be borne on any day during the financial year is 136,000, as compared with 151,000 in 1914–15. The numbers at the date of the armistice were 407,316, and by November, 1919, had been reduced to 157,000. The actual number required for the reduced fleet which it is proposed to maintain during the year is 127,500; but the provision under vote 1 for the pay of the fleet has been based on the assumption that 131,000 officers and men will still be borne at the end of the year, as it can not be expected that all those who are surplus to our reduced requirements can be disposed of during 1920–21.

There is great difficulty in suddenly effecting large decreases or increases in naval personnel, and the reduction of over 25,000 officers and men in the 17 months from last November to April, 1921, will, if accomplished, as we hope, be a remarkable feat. It must be remembered that the crew of a ship is made up of numerous small groups of individuals of many trades—gunnery ratings, torpedo ratings, engine-room ratings, signal ratings, electricians, armorers, mechanics of many kinds, and so on, each group possesses entirely distinct qualifications and having an entirely distinct duty, but each absolutely essential to the fighting efficiency of the ship. In every adjustment of naval personnel provision has to be made for each of these numerous branches of skilled men to be kept up to strength in every ship all over the world; any attempt to wash out naval personnel with a broad brush at once immobilizes far more units of the fleet than was ever intended.

The time is opportune for an explanation of some of the principal decisions which the board of admiralty have taken and of the motives by which they have been guided while framing these estimates, which may, perhaps, be described (in spite of the considerable provision for war commitments which they embody) as the first of the new series of peace estimates. I therefore append some notes on naval policy and a note on dockyard policy. It should be understood that these statements do not purport to be exhaustive even of the decisions already taken, still less of the matters which are engaging the attention of the board.

The statement which I issued on December 1 last to accompany the estimates for 1919–20 (Cd. 451) contained a summary of naval activities since the armistice. I have thought it unnecessary to present any detailed record of the work of the Navy and Admiralty during the short period which has since elapsed

WALTER H. LONG.

ADMIRALTY, March 12, 1920.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes for the purpose of asking a question or two on this very subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, during the last presidential campaign both the Democratic and Republican Parties put a solemn plank in their national platforms promising the American people the prompt enactment of a budget system. It is true that during the war, throughout the Sixty-fifth Congress, we were so busy that we could not follow it up, but soon after the 19th of May, 1919, when Congress was convened in extra session and this Republican House was organized, we appointed a Select Committee on the Budget, and I have been and am very greatly gratified to be a memer of that committee. Our committee went to work promptly under the very able leadership of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], and let me say that Congress and the country owe him a debt of gratitude and commendation for his energy and efficiency in securing as witnesses the most eminent experts on the subject in the United States, and in conducting the hearings we were favored by the advice and suggestions of some 40 of the most profound students of the subject in this country. Our hearings extended from September 21 to October 9, 1919, and made a printed volume of 788 pages and exhaustively covered the subject. As a result we prepared a bill (H. R. 9783) and introduced it, brought about its prompt and thorough consideration by the House, and on October 22, 1919, the House passed the bill on a roll call vote of 285 yeas to 3 nays. The bill went to the Senate on October 22, and apparently no action was taken on it until December 15, on which date the Senate committee to which it was referred held a short hearing on it. Then nothing was done for another month, when on January 14, 1920, another short hearing was held, all the hearings containing only 195 pages and being mostly documentary material and a restatement of their views by some half dozen witnesses who had appeared before the House committee and whose statements were fully printed, and from January 14 to this good hour nothing whatever has apparently been done with the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that the Senate committee has either reported the budget within the last day or two or anticipates doing it in a day or two, and I understand it is their intention to take it up within a week.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has been reported.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; it has been reported, as the gentleman from Tennessee says.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I ask to proceed for one minute more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the gentlemen are misinformed about the Senate committee having reported out the budget bill. I understand that committee contemplates reporting it out some time next week. But be that as it may, the question is, Why has this tremendously important measure been sleeping in a Senate pigeonhole for eight months? What is holding it up? Why has not the party in control of the Senate and House given this law to the country many months ago? What are they waiting for? I see by the newspapers nearly every day that Gov. Lowden, of Illinois, and Gen. Wood, and the junior Senator from Illinois, who is the chairman of the Senate committee that has this bill in a pigeonhole, and various other prominent Republicans are making speeches somewhere, loudly extolling the marvelous virtues and imperative necessity of a budget system in this country at this time, all of them trying to make campaign thunder, promising the people a budget system if they are elected. Why do not you Republicans keep the faith and do it now? Now is the accepted time. We have, all of us, promised the people this law. We have all the information necessary. Why wait another year or two? Why regale the people with more promises? Why do not the steering committee of this House put that budget bill right straight onto an appropriation bill as a rider, right now, and on this fortifications bill, and bring in a rule making it in order, and put it through this House now, instead of letting it sleep in the Senate and promising the American people to enact a budget system some time in the future if they are elected next November?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I only have a minute and can not, unless I can get more time. I am not criticizing this House, because we have performed our full duty in this matter. And I will not criticize the Senate, because that would be unparliamentary, but I will criticize the leaders of the party in power in both the Senate and House for their utter failure to enact this solemnly promised and vitally needed legislation, as they should have done many months ago. They have no right to hold this bill up to allow some prominent gentlemen to make campaign speeches about it and try to monopolize that subject as a campaign issue. Let us establish it now. With the exception of 3 votes, there was no opposition to this bill by any Democrat or Republican in this House, and there ought not to be any opposition in the Senate or any politics about it. I want to see this Congress keep the faith and pass this bill and establish this budget system in this country at this session and before we adjourn for the summer. The country needs this system now a hundred times more than it ever has. With the high cost of living going higher, with taxes and prices going to the blue sky, with waste, duplications, and unnecessary governmental expenditures as shown in the hearings there is no earthly excuse for delaying this bill all these months while prominent candidates are trying to make campaign thunder out of clamoring for a budget system.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my friend and neighbor from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] on his enthusiasm for the budget system, an enthusiasm which is shared by all the Members of this House and, I think, by a very great majority of the Members of the Senate. It is a very large question, which requires careful consideration. The Senate will in a day or two report the budget bill. They propose to take it up very soon. The gentleman from Colorado knows that the budget system, no matter when the bill we passed months ago becomes a law, can not become operative and effective upon the transactions of the Government until the executive departments begin to prepare their estimates, which are to be presented in October, so that if the budget bill is a law—which I trust it will be within the next 30 days—any time soon it will have been provided within abundant time to make provision for the earliest use that could possibly be made of it. As everybody knows, it passed the House months ago.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman to say that within 30 days we will have a budget-system law on the statute books?

Mr. MONDELL. I feel quite confident of that.

Mr. GARNER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the parliamentary situation, as suggested by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]. If he is not perfectly confident of that, there is no reason why it should be put on an appropriation bill. It has had thorough consideration by the House and thorough consideration by the Senate committee and the Senate, and it ought to go to conference now.

Mr. MONDELL. Nobody is more insistent about this thing than I am, and I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I have no sort of doubt but that before this Congress finishes its labors, which I hope will be the 1st of June, there will be a budget bill on the statute books.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

MEDICAL AND SURGICAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes, in which to have read a very short article on the subject of the medical and surgical history of the late war. This article is from the Journal of the American Medical Association.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have read, in two minutes, an article on the medical and surgical history of the late war. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. Does this deal with lancing also?

Mr. LAZARO. No, sir.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is just pure surgery?

Mr. LAZARO. I think the information is worth something to the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE MEDICAL AND SURGICAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

The Surgeon General, with the approval of the Secretary of War, is asking for an appropriation, in the sundry civil bill, for the publication of the medical and surgical history of the World War. In its projected form, this medical history will be more than an account of the rapid expansion and administrative achievements of the Medical Department; it will be a collective study of the many problems of hygiene, medicine, and surgery which were involved in the efficient medical care of the Nation's armies—in fact, a system of medicine and surgery based on the experience and observations of the physicians who guarded the health of our soldiers. The knowledge which was gained in hospitals and on the battle field, and the vast amount of medical research carried on during the war, can be made of immediate value to the medical profession and the public only by prompt publication of the medical history. There can be no question of the merit of such a work; as a scientific record alone the data will be of permanent value, irrespective of considerations regarding their utility as a source of information in future emergencies. The first volume of an unofficial history of the Canadian Army medical corps appeared last year; steady progress has been made on the official British medical history, and the history of German participation in the war will be issued in nine volumes late in 1920; much of the material for the American history is already collected, and publication waits on the action of Congress. Nothing can be gained from procrastination and delay; the appropriation requested by the Surgeon General should be allowed promptly. The medical and surgical history of the War of the Rebellion was delayed through 20 years. It is to be hoped that a similar fate does not await the publication of the medical history of the World War. If Congress does not, within a short time, make the appropriation necessary for the printing of this available material, the failure will be tantamount to an order for its destruction. In a few years this material would be of archaic but not of scientific interest.

ARTHUR WENDLE ENGLERT.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 795, for the relief of Arthur Wendle Englert, a House bill passed by the Senate with an amendment, and that the House disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up H. R. 795, and moves to disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is subject to objection.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is asking for a conference.

The SPEAKER. He moves for a conference.

Mr. WALSH. It is not in order to move for a conference. I should like to ask the gentleman if the Senate amendment increases the amount of this claim?

Mr. EDMONDS. It increases it $250.

Mr. WALSH. Over the House bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. Over the House bill.

Mr. WALSH. Or over the amount of the claim?

Mr. EDMONDS. Over the House bill.

Mr. GARD. What was the amount in the House bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. The amount in the House bill was $500. We reduced the amount asked for by the claimant from $748 to $500. The Senate put back the amount originally asked for by the claimant. The bill as it passed the House this year was reduced to $500, but the claimant last year asked for $748.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. EDMONDS, Mr. LITTLE, and Mr. STEAGALL.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD briefly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, upon what subject?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Very largely giving the reasons why I voted as the gentleman did last evening on the peace resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Was it not made in order yesterday for five legislative days for anyone to extend remarks in the RECORD on the peace resolution?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I may touch briefly on some other things.

USE OF T. N. T. FOR PEACE-TIME PURPOSES.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the report of John Swenehart, of the College of Agriculture of the University of Wisconsin, giving scientific and experimental data for the practical use of T. N. T., a war-salvaged explosive, for peace-time purposes, be printed as a House document, and that 5,000 copies be printed for the use of the House document room.

Mr. KIESS. I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, how much will this printing cost?

Mr. KIESS. This printing will cost the large sum of $45.10.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many copies are you going to print?

Mr. KIESS. The usual number, 1,345, and 5,000 additional to go to the document room.

Mr. STEENERSON. Would the committee have any objection to making it three times that number? I can use almost all of that edition for my own district. There is a large area of cut-over land which they desire to clear, and this will be a very valuable document for them. I should like to ask unanimous consent to have the number doubled.

Mr. KIESS. The document is a valuable one, and if the House feels like increasing the number to be printed, there will be no objection from the Committee on Printing. The cost of 10,000 additional copies would be $41.54.

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask how are these documents to be disposed of?

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged resolution. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. KIESS. Yes. I will answer the gentleman's question. They are to go to the document room, as there are many Members who will not be interested in this particular document. For that reason it is best to send it to the document room, where those who want the publication can get it.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution as reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NITRATE OF SODA.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of S. J. Res. 180, with a committee amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GARD. May we have the amendment read also?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in order to meet the existing emergency in the shortage of fertilizers the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to turn over to agricultural fertilizer distributors or users in this country such quantity of the nitrate of soda held as a reserve supply by the War Department as, in his opinion, can be spared consistently with the military needs of the Government, such stocks so turned over to be replaced by such fertilizer distributors or users with an equivalent amount of nitrate, the turning over and replacement being under such guaranties as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

With the following amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Iowa:

Strike out all after line 4 on page 1, and insert the following: "To sell for cash at the prevailing market price, at the time of the sale thereof, to such distributors or users thereof, in the United States, as shall request the same, and in such quantity to each, as he shall see fit, not to exceed in the aggregate 50,000 tons of nitrate of soda, now held as a reserve supply of the War Department, the proceeds of such sale to be repaid to the proper item of the current appropriations, originally made for such purposes."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Was this nitrate of soda secured during the war or before the war?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. During the war. It is in reserve now. There are something like 300,000 tons of it held by the War Department, and it has been thought advisable to allow the sale of 50,000 tons, which they can spare, to relieve a very pressing emergency that exists in the agricultural districts of the country. Owing to insufficient shipping facilities and the slides in the Panama Canal, the supply that should be in the country to-day has been delayed, and this is to meet that situation. The Committee on Military Affairs thought it would be better to sell it, and let the Government accumulate the profit themselves, than to transfer it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman's amendment provides that it shall be sold at the current market price; that would be considerably less than the amount paid for it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; the market price to-day is more than the War Department paid.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The Government paid $84 for the last shipment and the prevailing market price is higher than that. The Government supply was purchased for $56 up to $84, and the prevailing market price will mean a profit to the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then there is no loss to the Government by this provision?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; on the contrary there should be a profit.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There will be a profit, because the current price is a great deal higher than what the Government paid for it, and higher than what they can buy it for in Chile and have it shipped here.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am surprised that the price is less now than it was during the war.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. During the consideration of the deficiency bill we had the matter up and we provided for the construction of a scoop in the earth at Savanna, Ill., for the storing of our reserve supply of nitrate of soda.

This resolution should reduce our storage expense. We are now paying $13,000 a month for storage of nitrate of soda in commercial warehouses, and if the War Department will construe this action as the War Department should, they will sell the nitrate of soda now stored in commercial warehouses, where they are paying 35 cents a ton, and they will save the storage and at the same time sell at a price much higher than the average price paid by the Government. The average cost price paid by the Government is below $80, and the market price is nearer $90. If the War Department exercises the discretion that it should exercise, and sells the nitrate of soda which is stored in Jacksonville, where we are paying 30 cents per ton, in Galveston and several other points, instead of taking it out of the Government-owned buildings and out of warehouses where we are paying only 10 cents a ton, a very considerable profit will come to the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under these conditions I withdraw my reservation to object.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. DENT. I wish to add to the statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina that the War Department accumulated an excessive reserve supply of nitrate in anticipation that the war would last longer than it did. So that now it has no use for this nitrate and can dispose of it at a profit for the benefit of the farmers at this particular time, the shipment of nitrate having been delayed 30 days.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why confine it to 50,000 tons if that be so?

Mr. DENT. I will state that I do not think it ought to be confined to 50,000 tons. The Secretary of War stated to the committee that he would limit it to 50,000 tons.

Mr. WALSH. Why do they want to keep the balance?

Mr. DENT. I see no reason for it, and I would be willing to have the limit raised.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. BEGG. Does the resolution provide that it shall be sold to the consumer or the jobber?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Either one; it is to be distributed among the users.

Mr. BEGG. Is there any serious objection to a provision safeguarding it so that it will not be sold by the War Department to jobbers and then resold to the consumer at enormous profit? I happen to know that the War Department sold a vast number of buckets for 30 cents apiece the other day, and the man to whom they were sold never touched them, but resold them for $1.10 each. If we do not safeguard these sales, we are going to give them the opportunity to do the same thing right over with the nitrates.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We have safeguarded it as far as possible. The Secretary of War was before us and said that he would safeguard it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would the gentleman have any objection to adding a provision that the names of the persons to whom the nitrate is sold shall be reported to Congress?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think that is unnecessary. We can find the names at any time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think it is necessary, but I sometimes have suspicions of the way things are done.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the situation is acute with reference to the supply of nitrate for fertilizer. Within the last few days there was a hearing before the Agriculture Department in reference to the spread of the pink bollworm in the States of Texas and Louisiana, which brought to the National Capital representatives from all over the country, and especially from a number of the Southern States. I attended this hearing myself to help, if I could, to have taken appropriate action to safeguard the cotton interests and prevent the further spread of this pink bollworm pest. Those representatives attending this hearing told us in conferring with us about general agricultural conditions of the acute situation as to fertilizer. I assure you the situation as to fertilizers is very acute and everything possible ought to be done to improve the present situation, and I sincerely hope there will be no objection to this resolution, but that it will receive immediate consideration and be promptly passed in order to stimulate production and to meet the situation, at least to the extent it will furnish the relief so necessary and so much desired by the farmers. [Applause.]

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this same matter was added as a Senate amendment to the appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture. It is a Senate amendment which the conferees on that bill have considered. I think I can safely say, although the conferees have not finished their work, that this amendment now offered by the gentleman from Iowa is practically in the form which the conferees think it should be. But it occurs to me that the last two or three lines of the amendment of the bill are a little uncertain as to what is to be done with the proceeds of the sale. Reading from the bill, it says:

The proceeds of such sale to be repaid to the proper item of the current appropriations originally made for such purposes.

That may be the regular, orderly, proper way of providing for the disposition of money which comes into the hands of an official of this Government, but if it is I have not understood it to be the way. I have supposed the money should be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts or placed to the credit of a particular fund, to be used for a particular purpose. I suggest that some attention be given to the last sentence of this amendment to see if it is right in providing the method in which the proceeds of the sale shall be handled.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand that the proposed amendment provides that the proceeds from these sales shall go to the credit of some particular appropriation?

The McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The amendment reads:

The proceeds of such sale to be repaid to the proper item under the current appropriations originally made for such purposes.

It is a little irregular, it seems to me, although from my limited knowledge of these matters I would not be justified in demanding a change.

Mr. WALSH. It sounds as if that was in aid of Muscle Shoals.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That was put in there so that the appropriation would go back, so that if thought advisable they could purchase with this same money some more nitrate of soda.

Mr. WALSH. What do they want to replace it for when the gentleman from South Carolina says that they have no use for this now that the war is over?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Oh, the gentleman misunderstood me, if he got that impression.

Mr. WALSH. I meant the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. May I say this: The statement of the officials of the War Department is that they do need it. They take the position that in this country it is essential that they maintain a reserve of 300,000 tons of nitrate of soda, which is used in the manufacture of high explosives; that because of the Chilean situation as it developed at the beginning of the war it would be unsafe for this country to be without this amount, and that is the reserve settled upon. The officers of the Ordnance Department are very earnest in their statement that it would be very unsafe for this Government to reduce its stock much below that reserve. That is their position.

Mr. WALSH. That was to be the reserve when the country was at war.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; this is the position taken by the department at this time. Once we are in war, the only place from which we can secure nitrate of soda is from Chile. If we control the seas, it can be secured, and if we do not we are cut off from that supply, and therefore they say it is essential that that supply be on hand, and they have figured it out with a great degree of care and declare it is dangerous to reduce that reserve much below that amount. I think their position ought to be stated to the House.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, following the line of inquiry of my friend from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], do I understand that this resolution would allow an individual farmer, or an association of farmers, to put in an order for a ton of nitrate of soda and obtain the same consideration that a jobber would have?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is supposed to be the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. LAYTON. There is no limit on the amount to be sold?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is no limit on it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk again reported the joint resolution, together with the amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Iowa.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Add at the end of the amendment the following: "Provided, That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress not later than December 6, 1920, the names of all purchasers of said nitrate of soda, together with the prices for which sold."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. I want to strike out the words that give the Secretary of War the right to fix quantities. I can not quote them, for I have not a copy of the amendment before me. I think it provides in such quantities as he may see fit. I want to leave the amendment in such a way that if a farmer wants to buy 1 ton the Secretary is compelled to send it to him, and can not refuse to do so upon the ground that he is selling it only in 100-ton lots.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEGG to the committee amendment——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit that the amendment as detailed by the gentleman from Ohio is not in such form that the Clerk can report it. The gentleman had better get this drafting board to help him draw it up.

The SPEAKER. But the Clerk is reporting it. The Clerk will continue to report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEGG to the committee amendment: Strike out of the committee amendment the words "as he shall see fit," so that it will read: "to sell for cash, at the prevailing market price at the time of the sale thereof, to such distributors or users thereof in the United States as shall request the same, and in such quantity to each, not to exceed in the aggregate 50,000 tons," etc.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, the only thing I want to say on that proposition is this: I believe every man has an honest intention to make it available to the farming communities, if they shall want to use it and buy it, without its going through the hands of a commission man. If we leave in the words that I am seeking to have stricken out it is very easy for the Secretary of War to make a ruling that he will not sell it in any quantities other than 100-ton lots or more, and no farmer, or group of farmers, can afford to buy that amount at one time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman think there ought to be a minimum amount fixed—some reasonable amount?

Mr. BEGG. I would not object to a reasonable amount at all. The only thing I am anxious to do is to fix this so that it is available to the average farming community. I will eliminate even the little user.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the gentleman's intention is good, but there ought to be a minimum limit, or they would pester the War Department to death.

Mr. BEGG. What limit would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know enough about it to say.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, while I am not an agriculturist, yet the point suggested to me by the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is that some one under the gentleman's amendment might write in and ask that 25 pounds of the fertilizer be sent to him by parcel post, and the War Department might be compelled to deal it out in that way.

Mr. BEGG. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the gentleman and say that his experience in farming, if he ever had to farm any, would very readily relieve his mind of any embarrassment of sending for a 10-pound sack of fertilizer.

Mr. DONOVAN. If the gentleman will permit, I had in a small way, and I know there would be somebody in this country who would think that 25 pounds would be sufficient.

Mr. BEGG. I would willingly accept a minimum of 1 ton.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will yield, I think I understand the gentleman's purpose, but I want to ask if he does not believe that the profiteering in here that may be carried on by the jobber in selling to the farmer could better be protected by fixing the per cent of profit that the distributor may charge over and above the Government price?

Mr. BEGG. In reply to that I want to say to the gentleman that if this is safeguarded so that the farmer can buy in small quantities at the same price the Government buys at there will not be profiteering and you do not need to put a maximum profit the jobber can make, because the very fact that the farmer can buy from the Government will preclude any possibility of any man buying it and charging an exorbitant price.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I understand and should approve the result the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] wishes to reach. There should be some way by which farmers and other small purchasers can acquire this nitrate of soda; but some one must determine quantities in which it shall be sold. Under the resolution as presented by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], that determination is to be by the Secretary of War. If left as the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio would leave it some one else will have that authority or privilege. It may be that the first one who makes an offer satisfactory in price to the Secretary will be able to buy all he wishes. I can see no better way for large purchasers to acquire practically all of this nitrate of soda than to take from the Secretary of War all discretion and control over it, and practically leave it to the purchasers to make their offers, which the Secretary will have no right, on the theory advanced by the gentleman from Ohio, to refuse. It might be for half or all the quantity that the Secretary had to sell.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that there is a very small proportion of nitrate of soda used as a simple ingredient for use on the soil, and is it not a fact that this nitrate of soda will have to be taken to a fertilizer plant and mixed with other ingredients before being sold to the farmer at all?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. In answer to what the gentleman from New York says, it is true that only a small quantity of nitrate of soda is used as a fertilizer by a farmer; it is used in combination with other fertilizing ingredients. A farmer or anyone else who has the ingredients can mix them himself; it is not necessary for this nitrate of soda to go to the fertilizer factory to be made up or mixed by the manufacturer. It was suggested before the conferees on the Agricultural bill that the word "manufacturer" should be included, but the sense of the conferees was, and the sense of the Committee on Military Affairs is evidently the same, that purchases should be made only by "distributors and users," those who come after the manufacturer. And I insist, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution should give some official of the department authority to determine the quantities in which this nitrate of soda shall be sold. If we divest the Secretary of War of all authority in that respect, we may be placing it in the hands of those who will purchase or who offer to purchase, and the large purchaser may acquire all of it.

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman will yield further for just a moment, I want to thank the gentleman for the information. It is my understanding, however, that very few farmers do buy nitrate of soda and mix it themselves.

Mr. LAYTON. My experience has been otherwise.

Mr. SNYDER. I am speaking of my own section of the country; those are the only farmers I am familiar with. If what the gentleman says is true, I think with him there should be a limitation on the amount the farmers ought to be permitted to buy from the Secretary of War.

Mr. RHODES. If the gentleman will permit, where is this surplus of nitrate of soda located?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It is stored at different places, as has been stated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]—Galveston, Savannah, and other places.

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. I desire to say to the gentleman that my only interest in this bill is to see that under the provisions of this bill this nitrate of soda is made available for the individual farmer. In reply to what the gentleman from New York said, I want to say that it is not true that nitrate must go through the hands of a corporation or fertilizing company. I have used it myself. Farmers buy the various ingredients—fish screenings, nitrate of potash, and so forth—and they mix it themselves, according to the proportions they get from the agricultural colleges. And now, this matter ought not to be left in any dispute or concluded in such a way that we can not know that this nitrate will reach the man who needs it, without going into the hands of the profiteer.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Well, I will say to the gentleman that if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio should be adopted all control over it, as to quantities in which it will be sold, will be taken out of the hands of the Secretary of War; and suppose some distributor or user offers to make a large purchase, what control over the matter has the Secretary of War? Absolutely none. He has no authority to refuse the offer. It may be a favorable offer as to price, and under the law, as it will read if the amendment be adopted, he must accept it.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Who fixes the price for this nitrate of soda?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The Secretary must sell at the market price prevailing at the time. That is, the best price that anyone wishing to buy is willing to offer. I suggest it is dangerous to take away from the Secretary of War all control over the matter as to the quantity in which it shall be sold.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have very little self-interest in the passage of this resolution. The State I come from uses as little as any other State. However, every State uses some of it. My only interest is to make it possible for the users—the farmers—to get hold of this and use it on this present season's crop in order to produce food. We have gone over it in the Committee on Military Affairs of the House and the Senate and also in the Agricultural Committee of the House and of the Senate, and after consultation with all of them we have brought out this resolution in its present form. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will be defeated, because I believe it will delay the possibility of getting this to the farmer. We want the farmer to get this at once so he can produce food with it and thereby lower the cost of living.

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman's purpose is that distinctly, that is all I am interested in.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield to me one minute?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. At least 50 per cent of this nitrate of soda in its crude state is used by the farmer. This sale by the Government is not a new departure. For two or three years the Department of Agriculture has been selling nitrate of soda directly to the farmers, and there was no complaint about it going into the hands of middlemen. I ask the House not to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio for this reason, that if there is any danger of it being sold to one man that is cured to a great extent by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], which has been adopted, and which provides for submission to Congress of the names of the persons to whom it is sold. And discretion must be placed in the Secretary of War in the administration of the law. It must be placed in that department and not left to one person to purchase all of the 50,000 tons which would be possible under the amendment. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] will be defeated.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. The gentlemen of this House know that I am not a farmer. But it seems to me that putting the limitation upon the distribution or sale and bringing it down to certain amounts that the Secretary of War or his subordinates are permitted to dispose of of this material is entirely out of order and not in keeping with good business principles. No one can tell here just what quantity or amount of nitrate of soda should be fixed so that it would be universally satisfactory to all the farmers that might need it, and it seems to me you have got to trust somebody somewhere. Four hundred and thirty-five men have usually got 435 different ideas about how a thing ought to be done, and you have got to leave the actual details of managing affairs of this kind in the hands of some one.

And I believe, while I have a very high regard for the judgment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], his amendment is contrary to good business and it will interfere with this ingredient, that is so much needed by the farmers, getting to them, and will reflect against the best interests of the country. Therefore I shall have to vote against the amendment.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Certainly.

Mr. LAYTON. Do you not think that the bill ought to indicate a minimum quantity?

Mr. SNYDER. I do not think it ought to indicate a minimum quantity. I think that no one will want to buy the whole 50,000 tons of nitrate of soda, nor will anybody want to buy less than several thousand pounds. Anywhere between there that you might want to fix as a maximum or a minimum would be entirely out of order to be fixed by this House. I think that ought to be left to the man in charge of the proposition.

Mr. LAYTON. There are plenty of people in the country who would like to buy the whole 50,000 tons in order to make a profit on it.

Mr. MACCRATE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. MACCRATE. May I suggest to the gentleman that by adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] you are not taking away the discretion from the Secretary of War at all. As a matter of fact, as I see it, if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is adopted, the Secretary of War can sell it all to one person.

Mr. SNYDER. I would not care to have any restriction put upon the Secretary of War as to whether he should sell it to a million people or to one person. I am not so sure if it went to one person, if that person had the facilities to distribute it throughout the country, it would not be the best thing to do.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not require unanimous consent. The gentleman can withdraw it.

Mr. BEGG. I withdraw the amendment, and, Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his amendment and offers another one.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to offer an amendment following the word "each" in the fourth line, in the following words:

Not less than 1 ton or more than 100 tons to any individual purchaser.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BEGG to the committee amendment: After the word "each," in the fourth line of the committee amendment, insert the words "not less than 1 ton or more than 100 tons to any individual purchaser."

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to take out the word "individual," so that it would read "any purchaser."

Mr. QUIN. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment: Insert after the word "each," in line 4, the words "not less than 1 ton or more than 100 tons to any purchaser."

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I yield.

Mr. QUIN. I am very strongly for this, but I want to know why the gentleman wants to limit the amount to less than a ton? Some man might want to buy half a ton.

Mr. BEGG. I will reply to the gentleman by saying that if there is any reason for the passage of this bill it is an economic reason, to try to increase production. I doubt seriously whether there is any producer other than a small gardener—who is not a producer for the country to any great extent—that would want less than a ton. If there were such, two fellows could go together and buy a ton. It seems to me——

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to have in his amendment the word "one" instead of the word "purchaser"?

Mr. BEGG. I do not see any advantage or disadvantage in that word. I would not object. It would not make any difference.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] as amended.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, this question, raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], is a matter that this Congress will have to take notice of, in my judgment. The purpose of this amendment is to prevent profiteering in this surplus material which the Government will permit to be sold.

Now, what are we doing about it? There has been a clamor for the War Department to sell the surplus of all its accumulations, and yet we have put no restriction upon that surplus. You are letting it be sold every day down here by the thousands of dollars' worth, and yet you put no restriction upon the purchaser to prevent profiteering, when that was the purpose, as I understand, of the Congress when you called for the sale of this property; it was in order to help bring down the high cost of living. Now, I wonder why a resolution of some kind should not be passed by this Congress in order to take care of the situation, not merely in the matter of the sale of this nitrate to farmers but all this other property that is being sold every day.

I want to say that it has come back here to the ears of some of us from France that some of the property that we sold in France was sold by the French Government, and it got into the hands of the profiteers of France, and the French people themselves, for whom this property was sold at a low price, are not getting the benefit of it. I think, gentlemen, it is a serious matter that Congress ought to deal with. I know it is a hard matter to deal with, because we try to get on behalf of the Government the highest price possible for the property. That is commendable on the part of the officers of the Government, to procure the best price possible; and yet at the same time we permit this property to go unrestricted into the markets of the country and without any restraint against profiteering.

Gentlemen, I favor this amendment and favor this legislation, but I think it ought to go further and reach other property that is being sold by the United States Government.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Do you not think that particular thing would be properly handled so that it got into the hands of the right people?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes; but the gentleman knows that this material is being sold in such large quantities and we have constant complaints from people who desire to purchase small quantities that they have had no opportunity to buy this property, which was purchased with the proceeds from the sale of Liberty bonds, which these people purchased. This is a commendable provision, and I am not objecting to a provision to fix a reasonable price and allow the material to be sold to small purchasers.

Mr. QUIN. I am with the gentleman on this and all other matters. We tried to do that very thing.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Has the gentleman's committee reported out a resolution effecting the sale of all this other surplus property that is being sold down here now?

Mr. QUIN. Yes. Small quantities are being sold, and even shipped by parcel post now.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this resolution calls for the sale of 50,000 tons.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I understand that the Government is paying $13,000 a month for storage. Why not sell 100,000 tons?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection; but, at the same time, the War Department recommended that only 50,000 tons be sold. I believe that we ought to take the advice of the War Department and limit it to 50,000 tons. That is all they ask for.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to strike out "50,000" and insert "100,000."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROOKS of Illinois: In the fifth line of the committee amendment, after the word "aggregate," strike out "50,000" and insert "100,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURPHY. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 11578, the Post Office appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11578) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I think some of these amendments ought to be read before the conference report is considered, and it is not any longer than the statement. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11578) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 15, 19, and 20.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 17, 18, 25, and 28, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the words "to be available immediately," insert the following: "And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to turn over to the Postmaster General, without charge therefor, such buildings or parts thereof as may be desired by the Postmaster General and now located at Watervliet Arsenal, N. Y. And the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to cause said buildings or parts thereof to be removed to said land and to be reassembled or reconstructed thereon for the use of the Post Office Department"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "Provided, That whenever the office of a postmaster becomes vacant through death, resignation, or removal, the Postmaster General shall designate some person to act as postmaster until a regular appointment can be made by the President, and the Postmaster General shall notify the Auditor for the Post Office Department of the change. The postmaster so appointed shall be responsible under his bond for the safekeeping of the public property of the post office and the performance of the duties thereof until a regular postmaster has been duly appointed and qualified and has taken possession of the office. Whenever a vacancy occurs from any cause, the appointment of a regular postmaster shall be made without unnecessary delay"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out the word "aeroplane" and insert in lieu thereof "aircraft"; and in line 5 strike out the word "materially"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "$1,415,000" named in said amendment insert the following: "$1,250,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amended paragraph insert the following:

"For transportation of foreign mails by steamship, aircraft or otherwise, including increases hereinafter provided, $4,700,000: Provided, That not to exceed $100,000 of this sum shall be expended for carrying foreign mail by aircraft."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "of which $500,000 shall be available immediately"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is authorized hereafter, in his discretion, to turn over to the Postmaster General, without charge therefor, from time to time, such motor vehicles, aeroplanes, airdromes and parts thereof, and machinery and tools to repair and maintain the same, as may be suitable for use in the Postal Service; and the Postmaster General is authorized to use the same in the transportation of the mails and to pay the necessary expenses thereof, including the replacement, maintenance, exchange, and repair of such equipment, and the transfer and refabrication of such airdromes, out of any appropriation available for the service in which such vehicles, airdromes or aeroplanes are used: Provided, That the Postmaster General shall not use such aeroplanes or airdromes on any other routes than the one between New York, N. Y., and San Francisco, Calif., herein provided for."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Renumber the section to read: "SEC. 5"; in line 1 of said amendment, after the word "'That," insert the word "hereafter"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Renumber the section to read: "SEC. 6"; and the Senate agree to the same.

"(c) The commission shall investigate all present and prospective methods and systems of handling, dispatching, transporting and delivering the mails, and the facilities therefor; and especially all methods and systems which relate to the handling, delivery and dispatching of the mails in the large cities of the United States.

"On or before March 1, 1921, the commission shall make a report to Congress containing a summary of its findings and such recommendations for legislation as it may believe to be proper."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"(d) For the purposes of this section, the commission shall have power to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and to administer oaths."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 29: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the second paragraph of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, at his discretion, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to loan to any State of the Union, when so requested by the highway department of the State, such tractors as are retained and not distributed under the act approved March 15, 1920, for use in highway construction by the highway department of such State: Provided, That all expenses for repairs and upkeep of tractors so loaned and the expenses of loading and freight shall be paid by the State, both in transfer to the State and the return to the Army."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Renumber the section to read: "SEC 8"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreement of the House to the amendments of the Senate to H. R. 11578, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees as to each of said amendments:

The Senate recedes from amendments Nos. 15, 19, and 20.

Amendment No. 15 struck out the words "printing presses" in the appropriation for miscellaneous equipment under the Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General.

Amendment No. 19 rewrote the section 2, continuing the increased compensation under House joint resolution 151, and omitted the words "unless otherwise provided by law."

Amendment No. 20 authorized the property and equipment of the pneumatic-tube companies in the post offices in the different cities where located to remain until June 30, 1921.

The managers on the part of the House agree to amendments Nos. 1, 2, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 17, 18, 25, and 28.

Amendments Nos. 1 and 2 merely corrected the phraseology in the appropriation for the purchase of land for the equipment shops.

Amendment No. 5 added a clause repealing the limitation of $500 for rent and $100 for fuel and light allowable for post offices of the third class.

Amendment No. 6 struck out $60,000,000 in the appropriation for inland transportation of mail by railroads and inserted $59,886,822.

Amendment No. 9 merely inserts the word "further" after the word "Provided" in the paragraph relating to Railway Mail Service.

Amendment No. 10 strikes out "$932,156" and inserts "$1,032,156" in the appropriation for terminal railway post offices.

Amendment No. 11 strikes out the word "however" in the paragraph relating to the appropriation for transportation of mail by electric and cable cars.

Amendment No. 13 strikes out "$965,000" and inserts "$765,000" in the appropriation for manufacture of postal cards.

Amendment No. 14 adds a proviso to the appropriation for indemnity for losses or injury of domestic registered, insured, or collect-on-delivery mail, authorizing the Postmaster General to authorize postmasters to pay limited indemnity claims. This is designed to expedite payment of claims.

Amendment No. 17 strikes out a proviso to turning over motor vehicles, aeroplanes, etc., by the Secretary of War, which proviso in slightly different form is reinserted in section 4 of the bill as amendment No. 21.

Amendment No. 25 authorizes the payment of the expenses of the commission created under section 7 of the bill.

Amendment No. 28 directs the executive departments and independent establishments of the Government, when directed by the President, to furnish the said commission with information and records in their possession.

The House receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 3, 4, 7, 8, 12, 16, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 29, and 30, with an amendment to each, as follows:

Amendment No. 3: After the words "immediately available," for the appropriation for the purchase of land for the equipment shop, there is added a provision authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to the Postmaster General, without charge therefor, buildings, or parts thereof, as may be desired by the Postmaster General, now located at Watervliet Arsenal, N. Y., and authorizes such buildings, or parts thereof, to be removed and reconstructed on said land for the use of the Post Office Department.

Amendment No. 4: Rewrites the provision proposed by the Senate authorizing the Postmaster General whenever the office of postmaster becomes vacant through death, resignation, or removal to designate some person to act as postmaster until regular appointment can be made by the President.

Amendment No. 7: Strikes out the word "aeroplane" and inserts the word "aircraft" and strikes out the word "materially" in the proviso relating to contract air mail service, the effect of which is to authorize the Postmaster General to contract for an aircraft mail service between such points as he may deem advisable and designate, where such service is furnished, at a cost not greater than the cost of the same service by rail.

Amendment No. 8: Reduces the appropriation from $1,415,000, proposed by the Senate, to $1,250,000 for aeroplane mail service from New York, N. Y., to San Francisco, Calif., via Chicago, Ill., and Omaha, Nebr.

Amendment No. 12: Changes the amendment of the Senate which enlarged the appropriation for the transportation of foreign mails by inserting the words "by steamship, aircraft, or otherwise," so as to read as follows: "For transportation of foreign mails by steamship, aircraft, or otherwise," including increase hereinafter provided, $4,700,000: Provided, That not to exceed $100,000 of this sum shall be expended for carrying foreign mail by aircraft.

Amendment No. 16: In the appropriation for the equipment shop of $2,090,000, the Senate amendment proposed to make the whole amount immediately available, but this was modified so as to make $500,000 immediately available.

Amendment No. 21: Changes the language of section 4 proposed by the Senate relating to the turning over of motor vehicles, aeroplanes, and airdromes to the Postmaster General to be used in the transportation of the mails, and adds a proviso that such vehicles and airdromes and aeroplanes can not be used on other routes than the New York to San Francisco routes.

Amendment No. 22: Simply renumbers section 5 to section 4.

Amendment No. 23: Changes the language of section 6 proposed by the Senate relating to the permit privilege of first-class mail by inserting the word "hereafter" after the word "that" in the first line, making the section permanent law.

Amendment No. 24: Renumbers section 7 to section 6.

Amendments Nos. 26 and 27: Modify the language of paragraphs C and D, relating to the creation of the commission to investigate transportation of mail and the facilities for distribution thereof.

Amendment No. 29: The amendment proposed by the managers on the part of the House strikes out the second paragraph of amendment No. 29, which related to the loan of tractors by the Secretary of War to State highway departments, and inserts a new section numbered section 7 on the same subject. The original proposition of the Senate related to 5 and 10 ton artillery trucks, but as amended the provision authorizes the loan of tractors generally to State highway departments for use in highway construction, such highway departments to pay the cost of transportation, both for the shipment and return.

Amendment No. 30: Renumbers section 3 to section 8.

The net increase over the appropriations as passed by the House is $1,146,178, making a total now carried in the bill of $462,674,546.

HALVOR STEENERSON,

W. W. GRIEST,
JOHN A. MOON,
A. B. ROUSE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the conference report.

I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads what these buildings are at the Watervliet Arsenal, N. Y., which are to be removed or reconstructed for the Post Office Department, as mentioned in amendment No. 3?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is a mistake in the name of the place. It is Watertown, N. Y. Of course we can not correct it in the conference report, but I intend as soon as it passes the Senate to have a concurrent resolution passed authorizing the clerk to correct it in the enrollment of the bill. This amendment was offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and inadvertently a mistake was made in the name of the town. I received a communication from the Postmaster General yesterday calling my attention to the fact that the name Watervliet should be Watertown.

These buildings have been put up for a munition factory.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to explain that.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to explain it. He offered the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] asks what amendment No. 3 of the Senate means. It means this: The Post Office Department have a repair shop here in the city of Washington. It is not adequate for the needs of the service. The department have had an option on a piece of ground adjoining the shop for about three years. They had to take advantage of the option or not be able to get the ground. Somebody else wanted to buy it. Senate amendment No. 3 provided for an appropriation of $25,700 to purchase the land. The Secretary of War said to the Postmaster General that he had over at Watertown—and the Postmaster General said it was Watervliet, and that is the reason why the word "Watervliet" is in the report—a building constructed of steel and glass, in sections, that could be taken down in sections, that he had no further use for it, that he would be glad to turn that building over to the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department, anxious to utilize the ground that it is about to purchase, and thereby enlarge the repair shop, is very glad of the opportunity to take advantage of the offer made by the Secretary of War.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Wait until I explain it. The building can be taken down in sections, and the sections loaded on cars, and the building can be reerected in sections without any very great expense. Believing that it is of some advantage to the Government to be able to utilize a building that might otherwise be wasted, and knowing that it would save a large amount of money to erect the building in this way rather than in the ordinary way, the committee were very glad to give their consent to the utilization of a part of the building to be used for the purpose indicated. Now I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Where are these buildings?

Mr. MADDEN. At Watertown, N. Y.

Mr. TILSON. What kind of an arsenal is there at Watertown?

Mr. MADDEN. There is not any arsenal at Watertown. The gentleman from Minnesota just stated that that was a mistake. The Postmaster General, in making the suggestion, as I said, indicated that the buildings were at Watervliet, and "Watervliet" was written into the bill; but it turns out that it is Watertown. The only way that this can be corrected is by a concurrent resolution, which we expect to have passed immediately after this conference report is agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. It is not the only way.

Mr. MADDEN. We could withdraw the report. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ROUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROUSE. The gentleman says this was a Senate amendment. The appropriation was provided for by the House. The Senate amendment made the appropriation immediately available.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; that is correct. That is the whole story.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The appropriation by the House simply provided for the purchase of the ground.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if this has been considered by the Post Office Committee.

Mr. MADDEN. This building feature?

Mr. WALSH. This proposition in this amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. The purchase of the ground?

Mr. WALSH. No; I mean the proposition in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. No; it has not, but the committee thought it was a proper amendment.

Mr. WALSH. There are a lot of buildings here in Washington that could be moved with less expense.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but the gentleman does not understand the situation as I understand it.

Mr. WALSH. I admit that.

Mr. MADDEN. The buildings here in Washington would not do for this work at all.

Mr. WALSH. Would not they make good repair shops?

Mr. MADDEN. They would not make good repair shops, because they are not built substantially enough to carry the machinery and the shafting and all that. They have not the material in them that could be so reconstructed as to enable a building of sufficiently substantial nature to be constructed to carry the shafting and machinery. This building at Watertown is particularly fitted for the purpose. That is the reason why we propose to utilize it.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know what this building is at Watertown, N. Y., and how it happens to be under the jurisdiction of the War Department?

Mr. MADDEN. It was a munitions building, a Government building, and the Government has no further use for it, and the chances are it will be thrown away. Since it is built in sections, and can be taken down in sections and put up again, it is an easy matter to remove it and to utilize it.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that under this amendment the Secretary of War will deliver the building on the ground down here free of cost to the Post Office Department?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not understand that.

Mr. WALSH. Then who will pay for the transportation?

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the Post Office Department will pay for the transportation.

Mr. WALSH. Out of what appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. Out of whatever appropriation it may have at its disposal.

Mr. WALSH. I did not know that any appropriation had been made for the removing of buildings from one part of the country to another.

Mr. MADDEN. We have not made any particular appropriation for moving the building, but I think the advantage to the service justifies the economy that will result from the transfer of this building.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say that there is an appropriation available for the construction of this building.

Mr. WALSH. You made an appropriation for the building before you provided for the land to put it on?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; this bill does not carry any appropriation for the building; it carries it for the purchase of the land, which the Senate changed so as to make it immediately available.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman stated that there is an appropriation available for the building.

Mr. STEENERSON. I understood so from the Postmaster General.

Mr. WALSH. They must have made an appropriation for the building before they made the appropriation for the land.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman will wait until I finish my answer. There is a statute authorizing the construction of the building for this purpose, and when they asked for additional ground I understood them to say that they only needed an appropriation for the additional ground, and that there was a fund available for the enlargement of the building. I did not go into the details and I can not cite the statute. If they had wanted an appropriation for the building as well as for additional ground, they would have asked for it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I understood the gentleman to say there was a law authorizing the construction of this building.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; passed some years ago. This shop has been in operation many years. About eight or nine years ago there was an authorization for the construction and maintenance of shops.

Mr. WALSH. This proposition, it seems to me, is rather an important one.

Mr. MADDEN. It is important, and that is the reason the committee put it in.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman means the conferees.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; the conferees; and because of the value to the service, because of the necessity for it, because of the economy that will result from it, and because of its utilitarian character; and anything that may be said to the contrary does not change the value of it. It does not change the economy of it; it does not change the utility of it; and if by any chance it were not left in it would be a great misfortune and incur a large amount of unnecessary expense to the Government.

Mr. WALSH. That is all true. I admit everything the gentleman from Illinois has said; but it is a matter put in by way of an amendment, clearly legislation, without any consideration on the part of the Post Office Committee, simply as the result of a request made by the Postmaster General. I doubt whether we ought to encourage the heads of departments in procuring legislation on an appropriation bill simply upon request. I have no doubt that if this were submitted to the Post Office Committee, the distinguished chairman of the House committee, with the able assistance of the gentleman from Illinois, would possibly get favorable consideration from the Post Office Committee. I am not opposed to the project, and I agree that it will probably be an economy and give the department an adequate building for the purpose. But I dislike to see the House assent to this way of putting through legislation—simply writing a letter to members of the conference committee, and then jump in what they want on an appropriation bill without the appropriate committee having time to consider if or without the House having a chance to carefully consider it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. STEENERSON. This matter is in the nature of an emergency, because neither the Post Office Committee nor the department was advised of the existence of this building that was adapted especially for the use for which they want to erect a building on the additional ground. We held a hearing on the purchase of the land, and at that time I assumed that the Post Office Department had not found out about this opportunity. Now, they were informed that there was a building especially suited for this purpose, and the committee on conference had the matter inquired into and postponed it for a day or two in order to let the gentleman from Illinois inquire into the merits of it. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman or the managers on the part of the House given any consideration as to what the expense would be for moving this building and reconstructing it down here—what the saving would be by doing this over building a new structure?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say that the managers on the part of the House and on the part of the Senate had this matter under consideration and the facts were explained. But being somewhat of a business proposition we referred it to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who is a business man and a builder. He agreed to look it up. It did not come up again for a day or two, but he has explained it to the conferees as he has explained it on the floor.

Mr. WALSH. He has not given that information. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, Can the gentleman state in his judgment what the saving would be, if any, in taking the building from Watertown, moving it here, reconstructing it, over the erection of a new building?

Mr. MADDEN. I looked into it carefully, and my judgment was that it would save $200,000.

Mr. WALSH. And give them a building that is suitable to their needs?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and right away, so that they can utilize the investment in the ground besides. We need the additional building space very much for the work that is to be done.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman from Minnesota a letter from the Postmaster General requesting this action?

Mr. STEENERSON. It is in my office.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman be willing to put that letter into the RECORD as a part of his explanation?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly, and I will do so.

APRIL 8, 1920.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I note in the report of the conferees on the Post Office appropriation bill that amendment No. 3 authorized the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to turn over such buildings or parts thereof as are now located at Watervliet Arsenal, N. Y. The buildings are located at Watertown, N. Y., at which point there is no arsenal, and the wording of the amendment should be corrected accordingly.

Very sincerely,

(Signed) A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, very reluctantly I will withdraw my reservation of a point of order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I renew the reservation of the point of order. I want to call attention to another matter in this bill which in my judgment is most unjust and unfair and ought itself alone to be sufficient to prevent an agreement by the House to the conference report. That is, Mr. Speaker, the provision in this bill, written into it in conference, with reference to aeroplane mail service. Members of the House will recall that when we had this Post Office appropriation bill under consideration here the provision for aeroplane mail service was stricken out on a point of order. In the Senate it was put in as amendment No. 8, on page 16, providing for an appropriation of $1,415,000—between certain cities. The conferees, no doubt with a jealous eye to only certain sections of the country and for the purpose of preventing other sections of the country from having an opportunity to test out the aero-mail service, put in amendment 21, at the end of which we find the following provision:

That the Postmaster General shall not use such aeroplanes or aerodromes on any other routes than those between New York and San Francisco herein provided.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to state to the gentleman for his information why this particular route was established. It was to test all climatic conditions through which a successful air service can be conducted, and the experts in the Army and some other branches of the Government testified very extensively to the fact that this particular line would give more opportunity for the development of successful air service in all climatic conditions than any other route that could be established anywhere in the United States. It is because of the expert testimony to that effect that this line was established—not that some of us believed particularly in the matter of carrying mail by air, but that we felt that it was important that to the extent that the military navigation of the air could be developed through any system of work for the Postal Service, we should encourage it. For myself, I have never believed that it will be possible to carry the mail successfully by air at any price the people of the United States would be able to pay, but I am a believer in the air service for military purposes and to the extent that the Post Office Department can conduct this service and develop efficiency in the air service for military purpose, I am willing to lend my aid. Otherwise, I should be against it.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, a distinguished member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, is that this appropriation is for military purposes. I would like to know when the Post Office Committee became a committee to look after military affairs. If this item is for the purpose of testing aeroplanes for the Army for military purposes it ought to be in the Army appropriation bill and not in the Post Office bill, where the money must be accounted for to the people for the purpose of looking after the mails.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me again?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, the gentleman knows that he did not quote what I said correctly. I did not say it was purely for military purposes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman says that he would not be for it except for military purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. I say that again; that is my view, but as a matter of fact this appropriation is for the transportation of mail.

Mr. DYER. But the gentleman says that he is not in favor of it and that it is a waste of money.

Mr. MADDEN. It is for the transportation of mail by air, and I say, and I repeat, that I do not believe you can carry mail by air at any price that the people of the United States would be willing to pay; but to the extent that it does earn and at the same time develops military efficiency in the air, this postal facility ought to be encouraged, and it should be encouraged for that purpose, and that alone, in my judgment.

Mr. DYER. Yes. Mr. Speaker, the Second Assistant Postmaster General told me that they urged that these routes be so made as to include one from Minneapolis by way of St. Louis to Atlanta and New Orleans. Why does not that section have consideration in the determination of whether or not this kind of service is of benefit for the people? If they only want it for military reasons the Post Office Committee has no business appropriating that much money for that purpose.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. ROUSE. The Post Office Department recommended and asked the Post Office Committee for $3,000,000 for this service, but did not specify any particular routes. The Post Office Committee reported to the House a provision asking for $855,000, and a rule was to have been asked for making that provision in order.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Did not the representatives of the Post Office Department at the time of their hearing specify certain routes, including Chicago, St. Louis, and certain other points?

Mr. ROUSE. I believe they did, and an extension of the route from New York to Washington and to Atlanta.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. And those facts were under consideration at the time that matter was considered, and they indicated at that time, did they not, that the routes which they would establish first was a route from New York to Chicago and on to Seattle and one by the same route to Chicago and on to San Francisco?

Mr. ROUSE. I do not remember about that particular route. I know they wanted to establish a route across the country, but I want to say to the gentleman that the House never had an opportunity to consider that provision. When that provision of the bill was reached, the point of order was made and the point of order was sustained.

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. ROUSE. And the item went out entirely; the Senate inserted a provision for $1,415,000.

Mr. DYER. Then the conferees wrote in their amendment No. 21, which, if agreed to by the House and the Senate, even prevents the continuance of the air-mail service already in operation between Washington and New York.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, they have already abandoned that.

Mr. DYER. They would have to quit that and they could not experiment at any other place in the country except upon this one route. St. Louis could not have the opportunity of having the benefit of this service, although it has been represented to the people of St. Louis by the postmaster and other postal authorities that it was the absolute desire and intention to use this service there, and the people went to considerable expense on those representations, getting ready for the use of that service. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to give my permission or consent to having the Post Office Committee write into this bill legislation of this character, discriminating against the section of the country that I come from, and this conference report will not be agreed to with my permission for that very reason.

Mr. MADDEN. But this is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. DYER. I will make a point of order to something that is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. But that will not change this bill.

Mr. DYER. It will give the opportunity to see whether or not the House desires to discriminate against certain sections of the country in favor of other sections.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the gentleman briefly, if he is through.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. DYER. I will make the point of order when the time comes.

Mr. MADDEN. I demand the regular order. If we are going to have a point of order made, it ought to be made now.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman from Illinois has had some time, and I think the chairman ought to have some time.

Mr. MADDEN. I will yield.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, with reference to this aeroplane provision I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] that, as already pointed out, the bill carried an appropriation for air mail of $850,000 when it came to the House without specifying where. The department had a proposition, then, involving an expense of some $3,000,000 for St. Louis, Minneapolis, Atlanta, and so on, and for the continuation of the route between Washington and New York. The provision we put in went out on the point of order. The Senate put in this provision from New York to San Francisco. Now, if the gentleman will give me his attention there is this to be said: The House conferees were of the opinion, at least most of them, a majority of them, that as a mail facility the aeroplane service is not a success. We were satisfied that the route between here and New York had not expedited the mail, and it was largely a waste of money. With reference to this proposition of mail from New York to San Francisco there is this in its favor: As a mail facility it would not be justified, but the Senate put it in largely for military reasons. It was attacked in the Senate exactly the same as it is now by the gentleman from Missouri, especially by the gentleman from South Carolina [Senator DIAL], who asked for a route to Atlanta and New Orleans, and when we argued this matter in conference the conferees on the part of the Senate put forth the argument that this was not adopted here mainly because of its postal value but because of its value from the military point of view, and they cited the testimony of Gen. Mitchell before the committee, which is printed in the hearing, in which he at great length showed that this particular route would be of greater service to the military and to the Government than any other. It had the advantage of being a transcontinental route. It would establish landing fields and airdromes at proper distances. It would enable the Government to mobilize their air forces on the Atlantic or Pacific as the case might require. He emphasized the fact that this route would carry them over a high altitude of from 10,000 to 12,000 feet, which they needed in order to develop a certainty of flying at such altitude. They wanted for a military purpose to prove the practicability of a transcontinental route.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. In a moment. When he was asked this question: "Now, if you knew that only one aeroplane route could be established, what aeroplane route would you establish?" He answered unhesitatingly, "It would be the route from New York to San Francisco for the reason I have already given." He elaborated upon it that it was of immense value, and, besides that, it was the kind of experiment that could not be performed by the military branch of the Government. They had not the facility to fly across the continent.

A transcontinental line for postal purposes will aid the military branch of the Government more than any other. It will carry a heavier load than otherwise and aid in the experimentation with aeroplanes. This argument on the part of Gen. Mitchell convinced the Members of the Post Office Committee of the Senate that only one route should be put in, and they put in $1,415,000. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WELLING. Will the War Department or the Post Office Department lay out these routes?

Mr. STEENERSON. I think the War Department will aid the Post Office Department in laying them out.

Mr. WELLING. And select their landing fields and places for airdromes?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; they will be glad to aid, as they are very much interested.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the Post Office Department expect to have the use of military aviators to carry these mails in this service?

Mr. STEENERSON. The statement is that all the aviators are ex-service men. But when they are flying for the Post Office Department they are employed and paid by the Post Office Department, and they are not under the jurisdiction of the War Department, but they are men who have received their training in the Aviation Service of the War Department.

Mr. BRIGGS. Suppose the Post Office Department wanted to make a change by not finding it possible or expedient to carry this mail by air between New York and San Francisco; would not this proviso absolutely prevent them from doing so?

Mr. STEENERSON. I did not catch the gentleman's idea.

Mr. BRIGGS. Would not this provision in the bill, "Provided, That the Postmaster General shall not use such airplanes or airdromes on any other routes than the one between New York and San Francisco, Calif."——

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, I will explain that in a minute. It is not a new proposition. That is in another part of the bill.

Mr. ROUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. ROUSE. The gentleman knows this air service was never considered in the House?

Mr. STEENERSON. Not the San Francisco route.

Mr. ROUSE. The gentleman knows that no service was considered; that this item was not considered in the House when the bill was before the House in January?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is correct.

Mr. ROUSE. Will the gentleman state to the House why the rule was not asked for making this provision in order when he drew up a resolution for a rule?

Mr. STEENERSON. That was explained in the gentleman's presence here when the matter was upon the floor.

Mr. ROUSE. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SIMS. And the leader [Mr. MONDELL] stated here that the Rules Committee would not grant such a rule.

Mr. ROUSE. The gentleman knows that the committee directed him to ask for a rule?

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman knows nothing of the kind.

Mr. ROUSE. It is a matter of record.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman knows the committee authorized the chairman to ask for a rule to make the legislation in order, but did not give any direction, and I did not so understand, and if I was mistaken I can not help it.

Mr. ROUSE. Is it a fact the gentleman did not ask for a rule for the Air Service nor for the Motor Truck Service?

Mr. STEENERSON. Before the rule was drawn and introduced I went and asked the leader on this side whether or not the committee would grant a rule on that proposition. He has always favored economy, and I wanted to know before I drew the rule, and he advised me that no rule of that kind would be granted.

Mr. ROUSE. The gentleman obeyed the order from the leader of the majority side and not from his committee?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I deny that. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I was one of the supporters of this proposition in conference, and there was a division of votes.

Mr. ROUSE. I supported it in conference, because I am very heartily in favor of the Air Service, and I wanted the House to have opportunity to consider these matters, and that is the reason I was interested in the rule and this item.

Mr. STEENERSON. While I am on my feet I might as well explain the further provisions in regard to the Air Service. The Senate conferees convinced us that this was the most valuable route that could be selected, mainly for the reasons that I have stated, that it was of military value over and above all other routes, and, much to our regret, we did not feel that we were justified in spending any more money than the amount provided. The amount was reduced to $1,250,000.

Now, I want the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE]. The Post Office officials in the Second Assistant Postmaster General's office have made calculations for the purpose of inducing Congress to grant large appropriations for this service. They wanted to have lines all over the country. In order to use those lines they figured out they could carry the first-class mail with aeroplanes cheaper than they could in any other way. If you will examine the RECORD and the speech of the Senator from South Carolina, where he advocated a mail route from Atlanta to New Orleans, you will find he prints a table where the Post Office Department shows that there will be a saving of money instead of a loss in carrying the mail by aeroplane. Now, then, the conferees on the part of the majority did not believe that. We have not been convinced yet, but we take the department at its word, and consequently, under the provisions of the bill in relation to the appropriation for inland transportation of mail, we have put in in conference the provision that they may enter into contracts for aircraft service out of the appropriation of $59,000,000 for railroad transportation if they can get that transportation at no greater cost than railroad transportation. And I will say that railroad transportation has gone up 50 per cent in the last 60 or 90 days to the Government because of the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

We have also inserted here a clause in regard to the item of transportation of foreign mails, $4,700,000. We put in the item that not exceeding $100,000 may be expended in a contract aircraft service. That will cover the route from Key West to Habana, and perhaps two or three other routes equally important. Now, then, if the department is correct in that they can carry first-class mail as cheap or cheaper than by rail, then they can use the part of that $59,000,000 to carry the mail to St. Louis; they can carry it to Minneapolis, and they can carry it to Atlanta. Now, perhaps, I ought to explain to you why I say that. The reason they advance is that they can do it just as cheap, because first-class mail has to be distributed en route, in expensive railway post-office cars. They have to have in there distributing cases. It occupies a large part of the railway post-office car, for which they pay a compensation of 33⅓ cents per mile, and they say that with airplanes they do not distribute en route, but that they distribute in terminals and post offices, and with much cheaper clerks, and that the aeroplane goes so fast that they deliver the mail to the end of the route quicker than they could get it by rail. Therefore, they say, they save this car space, which is expensive. Now, if that be true, then you can have your air-mail route to St. Louis and to Atlanta and to Minneapolis. We can not always get what we appropriate for, because last year, as I have explained to the House before, we did appropriate expressly on the assurance that we would get aeroplane service to the twin cities, but after it was appropriated they failed to establish the service. It never has been established, although it should have been established a year ago. We put in this proviso to the appropriation for the transportation of mail by railroad as follows:

Provided further, That the Postmaster General may contract with any individual, firm, or corporation for an aircraft mail service between such points as he may deem advisable and designate, in case such service is furnished at a cost not greater than the cost of the same service by rail, and shall pay therefor out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

And if they can, as they say, carry mail as cheaply by air as by railroad they will carry mail to those towns—Minneapolis, St. Louis, and Atlanta. There is ample authority for that.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two about another matter. I think I have heard enough of that part of the question.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will be glad to yield later on that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that he will recall at the time the aeroplane carrying of mail was up for discussion with the Second Assistant Postmaster General I was there and questioned him in reference to the fulfillment of the promise made the year previous for aeroplane mail service from Chicago to Minneapolis, and at the time there was up for discussion a transcontinental route.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And I asked him if the service from Chicago to Minneapolis was in any way dependent upon the putting through of the transcontinental route.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And the Postmaster General said, "No; it was not." Now, my attention was called this morning to a paper received from the city of Minneapolis on the 8th of April to the effect that air mail service to Minneapolis was killed by Congress, based upon a telegram from the Second Assistant Postmaster General to the postmaster at Minneapolis. Now, what I want to ask the gentleman is this: If this paragraph 8 referred to in the conference report is adopted and becomes a law, will that in any way restrict or abridge the right of the Post Office Department to use the money that is now available for the purpose of extending service from Chicago to the Twin Cities?

Mr. STEENERSON. Not at all. The conversation the gentleman has referred to is printed in the hearings on that occasion.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. DYER. On that very thing I talked with the Post Office Department this morning, and they told me they were of the absolute opinion that if the conference report is agreed to they could not use any part of the machinery on any route at any other place than the one absolutely specified in this report, which provides for one from New York to San Francisco by way of Chicago.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is talking about another matter. I am coming to that in a minute.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman wants to know if Minneapolis was being experimented on.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] was talking about the route to Minneapolis. It was appropriated for, and the money is in the Treasury now, unexpended. The year expires on the last day of June. We appropriated that money on the assurance of the department that the service was to be established to Minneapolis. It has not been established. We have put in a clause here, on the assurance of the department, to take care of airplane mail when it is as cheap as the service by rail, and providing that they can use the money for that purpose. If it is true, as they say, that they can carry it as cheaply by air, they certainly will carry the airplane mail to Minneapolis. We accepted their word last year and now we do the same thing, hoping that they will get their mail by airplane or dirigible to Minneapolis.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I wish to ask this question of my colleague: If the appropriation is not all expended by the 30th of June, is that available for the next year?

Mr. STEENERSON. It is available for two years after the year expires.

Now, as to the matter referred to a moment ago by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER]—that is, amendment No. 21. It is as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is authorized hereafter, in his discretion, to turn over to the Postmaster General, without charge therefor, from time to time, such motor vehicles, aeroplanes, airdromes, and parts thereof, and machinery and tools to repair and maintain the same, as may be suitable for use in the Postal Service; and the Postmaster General is authorized to use the same in the transportation of the mails and to pay the necessary expenses thereof, including the replacement, maintenance, exchange, and repair of such equipment, and the transfer and fabrication of such airdromes, out of any appropriation available, for the service in which such vehicles, airdromes, or aeroplanes are used: Provided, That the Postmaster General shall not use such aeroplanes or airdromes on any other routes than the one between New York, N. Y., and San Francisco, Calif., herein provided for.

It was in the last year's bill. It is in the existing law, but it was changed somewhat in the verbiage, so that the Postmaster General was authorized to use such articles in the transportation of the mail and to pay the necessary expenses thereof out of any appropriation available for the service in which such vehicles, airdromes, and aeroplanes are used. We thought they might use the money appropriated for any particular service, including either maintenance or operation of these aeroplanes or machines.

There was doubt expressed by some of the conferees as to whether that would authorize them to establish and operate new routes with airplanes so obtained—operate them out of the funds in that service, whether it was a route to Minneapolis, or Atlanta, or elsewhere; but it was said it was not their intention to do that, and that they were perfectly willing to make it plain that this money should not be used except on the route established to San Francisco. That was the reason for adding the limitation as to the use.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I want to ask a question there for information. This amendment 21 also provides for airplanes and airdromes. I notice in the statement that is printed here that such vehicles and airplanes and airdromes shall not be used on other routes than San Francisco. That is a mistake?

Mr. STEENERSON. It simply applies to airplanes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There is no intention on the part of the committee to prohibit the use of the vehicles on the other routes?

Mr. STEENERSON. No.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, it has just been stated to me that the Post Office Department is building a lot of new machines now for the purpose of carrying the mail.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. This does not prohibit the use of those machines on some other route?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. SNYDER. Some of these machines I understand cost as much as $30,000 apiece.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] reserves a point of order.

Mr. DYER. I make the point of order. I will make it either to the Speaker or to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Let the gentleman make it.

Mr. DYER. I will make it if I have the opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DYER. The provision to which I make the point of order——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I insist on the gentleman making the point of order instead of making a speech. I demand the regular order.

Mr. DYER. Under the rules, Mr. Speaker, I understand the Speaker himself is the one who determines whether or not——

Mr. MADDEN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DYER. Without going into the various items of this bill which are subject to a point of order, I will only mention the first one, which is found on the first page. That is amendment No. 3. In connection with that, I call the attention of the Speaker to the rule, Jefferson's Manual, page——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DYER. The point of order, Mr. Speaker, is that this subject matter of amendment No. 3 has not been covered either in the bill that passed the House or the bill that passed the Senate, but it was put in entirely new by the conferees.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] admit that fact? It may save examination on the part of the Chair.

Mr. STEENERSON. We do not admit it, because we think that the subject matter is so closely connected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the bill. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Minnesota or anybody else on the committee if they wish to show to the Chair that this is in order.

Mr. STEENERSON. As I understand the point of order—the gentleman from Missouri has not stated it very clearly——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the subject matter was not contained in either the Senate or House bill, and the Chair must admit at first blush that it so appears to the Chair. The Chair will be glad to hear any suggestion from the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. Of course, if that were construed strictly, it would apply to this proviso. The proviso is attached to an appropriation for a building site, and it is to be placed on that building site—this building that we provide for the removal of is to be placed on the said land—and it seems to me that that is sufficiently connected. You can not very well say that that is entirely new legislation.

The SPEAKER. The House has attached a proviso to amendment No. 3. The Chair sustains the point of order, unless there is something further shown which would lead him to rule otherwise.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to be heard on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the House provided for an appropriation of $25,700 for the purchase of a piece of land adjoining the repair shop connected with the Post Office Department in the city of Washington, and the Senate made that immediately available. The conferees then provided for the utilization of the land by authorizing the Postmaster General to accept, without cost, the material in the fabricated building from the Secretary of War, which the Postmaster General is also authorized to erect and refabricate. So that, as a matter of fact, the two subjects are related, the one being merely an amendment or an enlargement of the other.

Now, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is willing to assume the responsibility of making a point of order to an item in a bill that saves the Government $200,000 and at the same time furnishes facilities with which to conduct the affairs of the Post Office Department more economically than they are now being conducted, of course the responsibility is his; but I do not believe the amendment is subject to a point of order. I think it was entirely within the province of the conferees to write this amendment into the bill as reported from the Senate, and I think it is perfectly in order for the Chair and perfectly within the rule for the Chair to hold this point of order not well taken.

But let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that it is subject to a point of order. Then let me ask in this connection whether the gentleman from Missouri is so obsessed with the importance of an experimental air line from St. Louis to Chicago that he is willing to squander $200,000 of the people's money in order that he may be able to curry favor with a few people in St. Louis, who want an air line that is not necessary? That is what I should like to find out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets very much to have a conference report go out on a point of order and in any case where he felt justified in doing so would overrule the point of order; but the Chair does not see how this amendment can possibly be hung onto the Senate amendment, so as to provide that it shall be immediately available, and the Chair is regretfully obliged to sustain the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I presume this necessarily requires the bill to go back to conference, and I therefore move that the House further disagree to the amendments of the Senate and ask a conference with the Senate.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that this point of order being sustained, the whole conference report goes back?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Now, when it comes back, what becomes of points of order to the remainder of the conference report?

The SPEAKER. We can not tell in what shape it will come back the next time.

Mr. MILLER. Will it come before the House in the same condition in which it now is?

The SPEAKER. We can not tell in what shape it will come back.

Mr. MILLER. If the same conference report comes back with the exception of the amendment which went out on the point of order, will it then be in the same parliamentary situation as to the other part of the report?

The SPEAKER. Exactly; yes.

The motion of Mr. STEENERSON was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. STEENERSON, Mr. MADDEN, Mr. GRIEST, Mr. MOON, and Mr. ROUSE.

CODE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 6025, to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR FORTIFICATIONS.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill, H. R. 13555; and pending that, I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN] how much time he desires for general debate.

Mr. EAGAN. I have had requests for two hours and a half, but I think we can cut that down to an hour and a half on this side.

Mr. SLEMP. Will that be satisfactory to the gentleman?

Mr. EAGAN. I think so.

Mr. SLEMP. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to three hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill be limited to three hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN]. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. SLEMP was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13555) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, with Mr. SANFORD in the chair.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP]. [Applause.]

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, the fortifications bill makes appropriation for the seacoast defenses of the United States, for Panama, for the insular possessions, and for mobile artillery. The estimates submitted to the committee originally were $117,793,330. These were subsequently reduced by the War Department to $66,294,114, and it is this latter estimate that was more largely the subject of investigation by the committee. The reduction is about $98,000,000 from the original estimate and $48,000,000 from the revised estimate. Inasmuch as there had been reserved in the hands of the War Department a very large sum of money for the settlement of claims arising from contracts for the production of ordnance, and which sum, under the law, was subject to obligation and expenditure prior to July 1, 1920, for ordnance production, it was necessary for the committee to ascertain the status of this fund at the present time and the extent to which it is to be used for ordnance production during the coming fiscal year in order to determine the appropriate amounts in this bill. The War Department responded to the wishes of the committee in this respect, and upon its statement that a little more than $800,000,000 of previous appropriations would be restored to the Treasury on June 30, 1920, this bill contains a provision preventing its obligation prior to that date. In this connection I wish to thank Gen. Rice particularly for his cooperation and assistance in determining the amount that can thus be returned. I can not thank the members of the subcommittee too much for their unselfish labors and cooperation. The quiet but effective work of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN], aided by the affable and courteous gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who uses the rapier with a smile, and whose delicate and friendly suggestions will always assist any chairman, however inefficient, combined with the comforting support of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OGDEN], who is serving his first term on the committee, are responsible for whatever merit the measure possesses. [Applause.]

The cancellation of previous appropriations to the extent of $800,000,000 has the approval of the Director of Finance, the Chief of Ordnance, and the Claims Board. It is likely that an additional amount will be returned on June 30 from the balances not recovered, which amount to $346,333,646.10. The fortifications bill in prewar times carried generally an annual appropriation of from $5,000,000 to $9,000,000. The estimate this year of $117,000,000 and subsequently of $66,000,000 by the War Department, so much larger than former times, caused the committee to give serious consideration to the amount of money spent on purposes connected with our seacoast defenses during the war, and also to what extent our supply of mobile artillery, including ammunition, had been increased during this period. The Chief of Coast Artillery reports that about $90,000,000 has been spent on our seacoast defenses since our declaration of war in 1917, an amount almost equal to two-thirds of the entire amount we had expended for that purpose in the previous years, while in mobile artillery and ammunition we have accumulated a quantity never before contemplated by any Congress.

During this period we have practically completed the installation of all 12-inch long-range guns contemplated by our seacoast service; continued the construction of thirteen 16-inch guns and twelve 16-inch howitzers, which had been insisted upon by our experts for many years; acquired 42 new and powerful 14-inch guns; secured about 300 guns on railway mounts, while the mobility of our Field Artillery is such that a large portion of it can in case of emergency be used in repelling an attack on our shores. Incidentally our ammunition supply has been accumulated to an extent greater than had been asked for in any board of review report ever submitted. Our mine project for the harbors of the United States is complete. Our fire-control project almost complete and standardized. Our searchlight program is in a progressive state of development, and our defenses generally are better than we have ever had them before. But apart from all these affirmative conditions the world has just come through the most devastating and destructive war of all the ages. The one nation that endangered the peace of the world in the philosophy it cultivated lies prostrate before the world, its armies disbanded, its fortifications razed to the ground, and its navy at the bottom of the sea. Other nations, with possibly a single exception, burdened with a debt they almost can not pay, struggling to restore the waste places of their countries and fighting to regain their moral, physical, and economical equilibrium, should offer us little concern for the immediate future. Should we listen only to considerations of this kind we should perhaps do less in this bill than we have done. Should we, on the contrary, prepare against every theoretical or possible emergency we might do more. The theory on which this bill is framed is that the United States both for itself, its insular possessions, and Panama should spend some money each year by way of insurance to maintain in an efficient condition the various posts established at so much expense, and to continue our production of war material in a small way so that the art of gun making will not be lost in this country, and in general to continue in such a state of preparedness that at little expense we can expand our productive facilities to meet any national emergency. For considerations of this kind the committee eliminated every unnecessary expenditure from the bill. To compare properly this bill with the previous fortifications bill is difficult, because the last bill carried a provision covering into the Treasury all balances unexpended and unobligated on June 30, 1920; but during this fiscal year expenditures were made of large amounts not appropriated for in the annual bill but carried in previous appropriations. In this bill we have cleaned the slate of all previous appropriations. The amount carried in this bill will therefore be the total amount that can be obligated during the coming fiscal year for the purposes mentioned in the bill. Had we continued the previous practice of continuing appropriations, this bill would have been much reduced, probably carrying not more than $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 as in former years. I wish the committee thoroughly to understand this.

The maintenance items, so far as they relate to our fortifications proper, differ very little from the appropriations carried for that purpose in previous acts. The cost of materials of all kinds is greater, and labor costs are greater, and this is reflected to some extent in maintenance items.

No money is appropriated for purely field artillery.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLEMP. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. Every year for 32 years there has been an appropriation for a Board of Ordnance and Fortification. Some time ago, as chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, while engaged in that work I discovered that there never had been any authorization for that appropriation. I called the attention of the Secretary of War to that fact, and after careful consideration he informed me that they would manage to get along without the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, and that he would not ask for any appropriation for that purpose. May I ask the gentleman what has been the result of that?

Mr. SLEMP. I will say in reply to the gentleman that the War Department withdrew the estimate of $58,500 for that board for the coming fiscal year, and will return to the Treasury Department the unexpended balance in that fund of $230,000, or a total of $288,500, so that the gentleman is responsible for saving to the Treasury $288,500.

Mr. MONDELL. That is worth while.

Mr. SLEMP. Our situation in this respect is that we have between 10,000 and 11,000 pieces of artillery, embracing about every standard type from 16-inch down to 3-inch guns, whereas before the war we had fewer than 900.

No money is carried in this bill for field ammunition, the large part of the amount carried for that purpose being for the preparation and care of the ammunition already on hand. This was urgently requested by the Chief of Ordnance.

In seacoast artillery, where the original estimates were over $14,000,000, $2,000,000 only is carried. The situation regarding this is that in 1918 the War Department entered into contract for the construction of thirteen 16-inch guns and twelve 16-inch howitzers for our seacoast defenses, perhaps the most useful and the most effective gun in the world, and requested by every expert board from the Endicott Board down. At the end of this fiscal year these guns will be in an advanced state of completion. The committee decided to continue their production, but at a reduced rate.

In seacoast ammunition consideration was given to the supply already on hand, to the obligations already incurred for the manufacture of seacoast ammunition the coming fiscal year, and appropriated a sum very much smaller than requested, but ample in all respects for our needs.

Repair and maintenance items for both seacoast artillery and field artillery are larger than usual, but were made necessary by the large amount of war material still on hand and not yet in shape either to be used or to be stored away. I confidently expect a material reduction in these items in the future.

The committee made appropriation for railway carriages for 14-inch guns. This is requested by every officer of the War Department that came before the committee as being in line with the progressive development of the use of artillery in substituting mobility for fixedness in our seacoast defenses.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. It was stated some time ago by one of the officers before the Committee on Military Affairs that we had field artillery sufficient to arm an army of 4,000,000 men. Did the committee look into that?

Mr. SLEMP. The statement before the committee on that subject was that we had field artillery sufficient to arm an army of 1,500,000 men. On certain arms we had a surplus for an army of 1,500,000 men. Of the 75-millimeter guns we have more than 2,000 surplus. Of the 155-millimeter we had enough to correspond to an army of a million and a half men. It was stated that we have a tremendous surplus, if you regard the Army from the peace standpoint, say something like 300,000 men; but from the standpoint of 1,500,000 men we have a sufficient amount in nearly all of the standard type and a surplus in some.

In this connection the committee makes appropriation of $1,800,000—for field emplacement, $400,000; to complete emplacement of the twenty-four 12-inch long-range guns, which lacks that much of completion, $400,000; to continue the 16-inch gun emplacement at Fort Michie, in which $212,000 has been spent and obligated and the remainder to begin the emplacement of the 16-inch guns and howitzers now under construction.

The character of these emplacements is not yet determined. Of the costliest type, these emplacements would cost to finish at least $70,000 or probably more. The Chief of Coast Artillery assures the committee that a study of this subject will be made this spring in connection with the Chief of Engineers to install the simplest kind of emplacements, securing the protection these wonderful guns afford with minimum cost.

Another point that had the careful consideration of the committee was the request of the War Department for large funds for experimental and development purposes. This applies to all kinds of war material—guns of all calibers and their carriages, ammunition of all kinds, fuses, tractors, searchlights, mounts for guns, and every kind of fighting utensil that should or could be considered by this committee. The War Department spent this fiscal year more than $2,000,000, perhaps $3,000,000, on this work alone. The theory of the War Department is that this experimental and development work should best be done now while the knowledge gained from the European war could best be utilized. While in general the committee agrees that this is most important and useful work, yet the committee feels that the development should take place in an orderly way, with fewer types considered, tested, and finally passed upon and then others taken up. The amount therefore asked for this purpose is much reduced, but yet involves a substantial amount.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. I will.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. This may not be germane, but out of curiosity I would like to know what is the cost of these big guns.

Mr. SLEMP. The cost of a 16-inch gun and carriage is $550,000. The cost of a 16-inch howitzer and carriage is $350,000. Guns and carriages under construction will be 60 per cent completed at the end of the fiscal year. The War Department says that all the howitzers will be completed during the next fiscal year, and also all of the 12-inch guns. The appropriations recommended by the committee change the rate of delivery of the 16-inch guns and howitzers.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. What is the maximum range of these large guns?

Mr. SLEMP. That depends on a lot of facts, such as the rifling in the gun, the character of the projectile, and the change of the band, and so on. Recently a change was made in the bands in the production of the smaller type of guns, and that increased the range materially. They expect to be able to have the 16-inch guns have a range of 40,000 or 50,000 yards, and one officer stated as high as 60,000 yards. A 16-inch howitzer may be regarded as having a range of 50 per cent of the 16-inch gun. The reason for the difference in the range of the howitzer is that it fires at such an elevation that it will attack the deck armor of a vessel, while the 16-inch gun will attack the side armor.

What is the absolute effective range of destruction against a battleship seems difficult to determine. They are intended to attack a 13½-inch side armor, and of course a smaller armor on deck, because the deck armor usually runs about 3 inches. The penetration depends upon the angle at which the shot strikes the object. Their effort is to get a range up to 40,000 yards for a 20 per cent degree of impact against the armor. I should say a 16-inch gun would get up to 40,000 yards and the development of a change in the shell would make it between 40,000 and 60,000 yards.

In aviation the committee took action only on the estimates submitted to it. For the Hawaiian Islands the bill carries an appropriation of $1,300,000 and $239,000 for Panama, both of which are very essential.

In regard to the Panama item, of the $239,000, $230,000 is for the enlargement of France Field and $9,000 for emergency landing places. It was testified before the committee that several boys had lost their lives on the France Field because of the shortness of the field.

In the Hawaiian item we have the aviation personnel all there without housing or barracks in which to live and without fresh water to drink; the water supply is brackish; they are also without sewerage facilities, and this bill carries the minimum amount, or a reduction of 50 per cent of what the War Department asked.

There are only 65 minor items and 8 legislative items in the bill. About half these items approximate the amounts carried in previous acts and the remainder I have given a general explanation of.

The bill is submitted to the committee by unanimous vote of both the Subcommittee on Fortifications and the full Committee on Appropriations, with the confident hope that it will merit the approval of the Committee of the Whole. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] 15 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hope gentlemen will not consider my speech political, although it is in a sense political.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it a corollary to what happened yesterday?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know to what the gentleman refers. I will say that some industrious person has given out a statement—I do not believe it comes from the Treasury Department—that during this fiscal year down to the 31st of March our public debt has been very materially reduced, and for the month of March reduced to the extent of about three-quarters of a billion dollars, which is an error. But that statement has gone out broadcast over the country through the newspapers and has been so changed as to comment favorably upon the work of the administration in reducing the public debt during that length of time.

The administration apparently released a statement to the press April 1 calling attention to the marked reduction in the national debt during the month of March. The publicity given this statement in certain channels points with considerable pride to this reduction and other reductions accomplished by the administration during the current fiscal year 1920.

The following article is typical of newspaper comment on April 2, and purports to be based on statements by Treasury officials:

$705,660,000 REDUCTION MADE IN NATIONAL DEBT IN MARCH—CUT IS MORE THAN DOUBLE THAT OF ANY PREVIOUS MONTH AND INDICATES SUCCESS OF FINANCIAL PROGRAM, SAYS TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

WASHINGTON, April 2.

A reduction of $705,660,000 in the national debt—more than double the amount by which the debt was lowered during any previous month—was accomplished in March, the Treasury reported to-night. The national debt now stands at $24,698,000,000.

Officials said this record could not be used as a basis for forecasting further monthly reductions. They regarded it, however, as "sound evidence" of the success of the Treasury program for financing the postwar period when Government expenditures still continue to run high.

March payments on the public debt were confined almost wholly to retirement of certificates of indebtedness issued in anticipation of income and profit taxes.

Reductions by months since August, when the retirements began, were: October, $15,533,000; November, $94,478,000; December, $278,973,000; January, $168,689,000; and February, $264,057,000. Heavy payments on the debt in December and February were traceable to the retirement of certificates of indebtedness, but the amount of obligations retired each month, although fluctuating, has been on the increase.

Future monthly reductions will hinge largely on new appropriations and tax legislation, officials said. They expected, however, that operation of the sinking fund would reflect more and more on the gross national debt each month hereafter. None would venture a prediction as to the net reduction for the calendar year.

As the public debt now stands it is made up of $15,616,800,000, comprising the four issues of Liberty bonds, $4,422,700,000 of Victory short-term notes, $2,667,220,000 in Treasury certificates, $870,000,000 in war-savings certificates, and approximately $1,000,000,000 in bonds issued prior to the World War.

The greatest single item among those old bonds is the issue of consols of 1930, which aggregate $600,000,000.

I call attention to the fact that this article states that officials regard the reduction in the national debt as "sound evidence" of the success of the Treasury program. That alleged "sound evidence," permit me to say, is based on a wholly fictitious reduction of the national debt.

Such claims, if made deliberately, resolve themselves into sheer misrepresentation; misrepresentation which raises false hopes and a false confidence in the public mind. The outstanding fact is that since July 1, 1919, our disbursements have exceeded our revenue from all sources by $214,207,713.82.

CASH BALANCE IN TREASURY EXHAUSTED TO REDUCE PUBLIC DEBT.

Our public debt since June 30, 1919, the close of the fiscal year 1919, has been reduced to the extent of but $785,934,576.05.

The explanation of this net reduction during a period when our expenditures exceeded receipts is in this: The cash balance, current assets, of the general fund during this period were decreased to the extent of $1,000,042,289.35.

In other words, the improvement in the status of our funded debt, since June 30, 1919, has been more than offset by the depreciation of a billion dollars in our cash assets.

The situation is summed up in the following table:

Cash balance June 30, 1919	$1,251,664,827.54
General fund Mar. 1, 1920	251,622,538.19
Decrease in cash assets		$1,000,042,289.35
Public debt June 30, 1919	$25,484,506,160.05
Public debt Mar. 31, 1920	24,698,671,584.52
Decrease in public debt		785,735,575.53
Net decrease in assets		214,207,713.82

For the purpose of showing the comparative condition of the Treasury, the balance in the general fund should be deducted from the gross debt. I will here give the difference between gross debt and net balance, month by month, from June 30, 1919, to March 31, 1920:

	Gross debt.	Balance in general fund.	Difference.
June 30	$25,484,506,160	$1,251,664,827	$24,232,841,333
July 31	25,800,033,536	818,700,336	24,981,333,200
Aug. 31	26,596,701,648	1,118,109,534	25,478,592,114
Sept. 30	26,194,996,798	1,191,738,500	25,003,258,298
Oct. 31	26,210,530,269	888,032,521	25,322,497,748
Nov. 30	26,116,051,951	666,107,671	25,449,844,280
Dec. 31	25,837,078,807	987,415,459	24,852,663,348
1920.
Jan. 31	25,668,389,095	725,770,078	24,942,619,017
Feb. 29	25,404,331,707	395,782,596	25,008,549,111
Mar. 31	24,698,671,584	251,622,538	24,447,049,046

This indicates that the condition of the Treasury is less favorable on March 31, 1920, than on June 30, 1919, by $214,000,000, and this is in harmony with statement contained in the Daily Statement of the United States Treasury of March 31, 1920, which gives the excess of disbursements over receipts as $214 207,713.

WHY DID THE GOVERNMENT CARRY SUCH ENORMOUS CASH BALANCES?

The Treasury closed the month of March, 1920, with a cash balance of but $251,000,000. From June 30, 1919, up to the beginning of February, 1920, the cash balances in the Treasury have fluctuated from approximately $700,000,000 to $1,250,000,000. During this period the refunding of maturing Treasury certificates by new issues of certificates was constantly going on.

Why the Treasury Department did not exhaust these balances in order to reduce the debt at an earlier date is the question which might be appropriately asked.

In the same connection it should be pointed out that, with the cash balance exhausted, the Treasury Department now recognizes the necessity for new borrowings, through Treasury short-term certificates, to meet expenses for the next two months.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S POSTWAR EXPENDITURES PROGRAM.

Real and permanent improvement in the condition of the Treasury can come only from economical administration. The American people had hoped that the current fiscal year 1920 would witness a substantial return to prewar conditions and prewar expenditures. With the signing of the armistice Congress expected that the administration would submit a definite program of retrenchment and readjustment in connection with its estimates, then about to be transmitted, for the fiscal year 1920.

The original estimates, which were transmitted on December 18, 1918—subsequent to the armistice—failed to reveal real effort toward retrenchment. They called for $8,000,000,000. It was the administration's formal demand for appropriations covering a fiscal year which would not begin until eight months after the armistice. On analysis they appeared to be a mere compilation of departmental requests without reductions, explanations of increase, or coordination looking toward economy. Their submission followed the customary, formal, and—in the expressed indifference of economy—casual methods of computing requests which had been universally condemned.

In addition to the original estimates calling for $8,000,000,000, there were submitted supplemental requests not included in the original requests, which amounted to more than $3,000,000,000. The estimates, original and supplemental, and the appropriations, original and supplemental, for 1920 might be summed up as follows:

Requests:
a. Regular (original estimates)	$8,089,667,298
b. Supplemental and deficiency (not included in original)	3,128,243,372
Total requests		$11,218,191,670
Appropriations:
a. Regular	3,035,151,723
b. Supplemental and deficiency (including permanent, etc.) (1)	4,328,544,657
Total appropriations		7,363,696,380
Difference between total requests of administration and allowances of Sixty-fifth and Sixty-sixth Congresses for 1920		3,854,495,290

In other words, the Sixty-fifth and Sixty-sixth Congresses—both of which participated in the original as well as supplemental 1920 appropriations—reduced the appropriations requested by the administration to the extent of 34.36 per cent, more than one-third.

FAILURE OF ADMINISTRATION TO DEVELOP A POSTWAR EXPENDITURE PROGRAM.

Economy, retrenchment, and improvement of the condition of the Treasury must be based upon a sane expenditure policy. In the light of requests for appropriations for 1920, calling for $11,000,000,000—98 per cent of which came from the administration—the taxpayer might well ask: What is the postwar expenditure policy of the present administration?

For months the Sixty-fifth and Sixty-sixth Congresses struggled in 1919 with the original estimates, which, in large part, were guesswork—and officials from the departments admitted that hundreds of the guesses were wrong—to determine what the administration's expenditure policy contemplated. Information was not submitted with the estimates. Shifting from a war to a peace basis is largely an administration problem. But it was evident that the executive departments lacked a definite administration program for its accomplishment. It was necessary for the several appropriations committees to develop this information, through hearings, investigations, and independent analyses.

By cutting in this direction and that direction, almost $4,000,000,000 was eliminated from the original and supplemental estimates.

COMPARISON OF 1920 REQUESTS (ESTIMATES) WITH 1916 EXPENDITURES.

The 1920 estimates of the administration furnish no comparison of the amounts asked for with the amounts which had been allowed or asked for before the war. The only comparisons made—and these are fragmentary—have to do with war periods, 1918 and 1919.

TABLE OF COMPARISON, 1916–1920.

The following table furnishes, under the main or primary functions of the Government, a comparison of the amounts actually spent—disbursed—in 1916 with the amounts which the administration requested in 1920, showing the percentage of increase, by function, of the request over the 1916 expenditure. The amounts include not only the original requests, but also the supplemental requests already explained, which were not included in the original estimates:

Classification.	1916	1920	Increase, 1920 over 1916.
			Amount.	Percentage.
Legislation	$7,831,241	$10,344,805	$2,513,564	32.10
General administration	88,224,854	273,749,580	185,524,726	210.29

Civil service	153,108,836	2,747,586,135	2,594,477,299	1,694.53
Judicial	8,355,939	11,850,201	3,494,262	41.82
Local government	13,958,990	20,132,308	6,173,318	44.22
Permanent obligations	22,900,313	1,792,300,000	1,769,399,687	7,726.53
Total ordinary	741,996,727	10,608,725,521	9,866,728,794	1,329.75
Postal (payable out of revenues)	306,228,453	609,466,149	303,237,696	99.02
Grand total	1,048,225,180	11,218,191,670	10,169,966,490	970.21

It is realized that there are legitimate influences and burdens of the war which survive—burdens which would prevent an immediate return to prewar cost of operations. Nevertheless the prewar period furnishes the only accurate base of comparison. It presents administrative activities developed on a basis comparable to what are now being carried on and will be projected during the fiscal year 1921. A comparison of the costs—one against the other—fixes the exact amount of increases by activities and facilitates definite thinking as to the factors involved in the increases.

Eliminating the $22,000,000 requested for the legislative and the judicial branches of the Government, or but one-fifth of 1 per cent of the entire amount requested, the foregoing statement reveals increases all along the line which are staggering.

COMPARISON OF 1921 REQUESTS (ESTIMATES) WITH 1916 EXPENDITURES.

Furthermore this fact, with respect to the administration's expenditure program for 1921, is even more startling. If Congress allowed for the fiscal year 1921 all the funds which were requested by the administration in the estimates already submitted—and which call for approximately $5,000,000,000—the Government would probably close the next fiscal year in a worse condition than we will end the current fiscal year.

Glance at the estimates and the reason is obvious. They reveal, in the staggering amounts again requested, the lack of any definite plan of retrenchment.

The present Congress is holding daily hearings and conducting numerous investigations in order to reduce the administration's unwarranted appropriation requests for 1921—which without deficiencies call for $4,865,410,032—by at least a billion and a quarter dollars—this is its "retrenchment slogan." But no comprehensive reports have been submitted by the administration presenting administrative needs and the expenditure requirements in such a way as to facilitate a discussion of such retrenchment either on the part of Congress or the public.

The following table furnishes under each primary function of the Government a comparison of the amounts actually spent—disbursed—in 1916, with the amounts which the administration has requested for 1921 in the estimates before Congress at the present time, showing the percentage of increase by function of such requests for 1921 over the expenditures for 1916:

	Expenditures, 1916.	Request, 1921.	Increase, 1921 over 1916.

TABLE OF SAVINGS OR REDUCTIONS IN APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE YEAR 1920.

The appropriations made by the Sixty-fifth and Sixty-sixth Congresses were indeed substantial. The amount of reductions, however, under the requests made by the administration in the original and supplemental estimates are, however, very large. The amount of $3,854,495,290, or 34.36 per cent of the total amount requested, represents the net result of the effort of Congress to economize and force something in the way of a retrenchment program on the administration.

The following table furnishes under each main or primary function of the Government a comparison of the amounts actually appropriated for 1920—including original and supplemental appropriations—with the amounts which the administration requested for 1920—including the original and supplemental requests. In parallel columns are shown the percentage of decrease or increase of the appropriations with requests:

SAVINGS TO BE EFFECTED BY CONGRESS FOR THE FISCAL YEAR 1921.

It is premature to forecast, with any degree of accuracy, the amount which Congress will disapprove in the requests of the administration, which approximate $5,000,000,000. The last figures, however, on the several appropriation bills which have been reported out of Appropriations Committees indicate that the total saving will approximate $1,250,000,000, as outlined. This saving will be in accordance with the policy laid down by the majority leader, Hon. FRANK MONDELL, in his statement on the floor of Congress, in the month of January, at the time the first appropriation bill was reported out of committee with a saving of 28 per cent.

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP], chairman of the fortifications subcommittee, did his colleagues on the subcommittee too much honor in his complimentary remarks regarding our industry and service. I think every member of that subcommittee, with the exception of its modest chairman, will agree with me in the statement that he has rendered a very great service to the country and to the Congress by his own extraordinary diligence and because of his unusually keen business intellect. His mastery of the many and intricate details of the estimates on which this bill is based are evidenced on every page of the hearings. He has saved us a very great deal of work and has done the work much better than any of his colleagues on the subcommittee could have hoped to do it. [Applause.]

The members of the subcommittee are agreed that he has proven a very worthy successor to his distinguished predecessors in the chairmanship of this subcommittee—Hon. Swagar Sherley, of Kentucky; the late William T. Borland, of Missouri; and to the acting chairman of last year, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The fortifications appropriation bill is perhaps the most highly technical bill with which the Committee on Appropriations has to do. The items which make up the bill have been thoroughly explained by the chairman, and I shall not take the time of the committee in going over the same ground. The original estimates submitted by the War Department totaled $117,734,839. These estimates were subsequently reduced by the department to $66,235,614. This bill recommends the granting of $18,833,442, as against $11,214,291 carried in the fortifications bill for last year.

The chairman said the members of the subcommittee were in accord with every item in the bill. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and I, however, are strongly of the opinion that a very serious mistake was made in failing to make provision in this bill for continuing and making available the sum of $9,617,179.38 of the appropriations heretofore made for aviation purposes for use in connection with the seacoast defenses of the United States and authorizing the Secretary of War to expend from said sum about $596,725, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purchase or acquisition of land necessary for aviation stations in connection with coast defenses of continental United States. At the proper place in the bill I shall move an amendment to provide for the reappropriation of this sum.

The following table, which will be found on pages 344 and 345 of the hearings, will be of interest in this connection:

Detail of estimates, continental United States.

[No new appropriation is asked.]

	Former appropriation.	Obligation.	Reservation.	Free balance.
Aviation, seacoast defense	$3,600,000.00	$894,779.14	$0.00	$2,705,200.86

Gen. Menoher, Director of the Air Service, testified before the subcommittee that it was absolutely necessary to continue the appropriation and to give the authority to purchase the necessary land. The projects on which the funds have been obligated, reserved, or on which it is proposed to apply the free balances, he said, were the result of a definite and very careful study made by both the Army and the Navy prior to the war for the purpose of carrying into effect the functions of coastal air service assigner to the Army in the report of the Joint Army and Navy Board on March 12, 1917, and as redefined and reapproved by the joint board on January 22, 1920. These projects have had the definite sanction of Congress, as shown by the appropriations made therefor in 1917 and 1918.

I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know that I shall consume all of the time so generously accorded to me, but I do want to take advantage of this occasion to pay a very just tribute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP], the chairman of the subcommittee which has had in charge the hearings and the preparation of this particular bill. Having been a member of the subcommittee, I am in a position to be familiar with the tireless energy that he has displayed, with the very great labor that he has performed, and with what very great ability and keen business insight he has met the responsibilities which have rested more heavily, naturally, upon his shoulders than upon the shoulders of any other members of the subcommittee.

As the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN] has said, this is a highly technical bill. I dare say that there is no appropriation bill presented to Congress which is so highly technical in all of its many details, in respect to the character, type, caliber of guns, the various kinds of ammunition, and other features in the bill. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP] has mastered this bill in a manner that has not been excelled by any of those chairmen who have served in the same capacity during the time that I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, or for the past 10 years. [Applause.]

I feel it is nothing but fair to him to say that the great merit which I believe is contained in this bill is largely due to the work which he put upon it before the hearings commenced, and also as a result of the very careful hearings that he conducted during its consideration by the subcommittee. I regard this bill, gentlemen of the committee, as a splendid bill in many respects. The fact of the business is I have only one or two objections to it. It is an economy measure, and the estimates have been greatly reduced, but I believe that in the appropriations which are sought to be made we have adequately taken care of our coast defenses during the next fiscal year with a few exceptions, of some of which I shall speak later on. Seacoast fortifications are largely in the nature of insurance. They may be considered somewhat like the insurance that a man takes upon his home. If he insures his house or his building and no fire occurs during that year it might be said that he had lost the amount of the premium by reason of taking the insurance, but he is, of course, protected against any possible loss that may occur during the year and he is willing to pay the premium in order to secure that protection. The country is spending several millions of dollars each year in maintaining our seacoast fortifications. Of course, if no war occurs, if no enemy attacks our coast, it might be said that the money could have been saved, but the difficulty is that we do not know when we are going to be thrown into war or when some enemy may attack us, and it is therefore highly important that adequate provision should be made to protect these important cities upon our coasts and the important harbors upon our coasts, so that in the event of trouble with some foreign country an enemy may not have an opportunity to work serious loss upon the property of this country and take possession of our harbors and points of strategic importance. The gentleman from Virginia has very fully discussed the main provisions of this bill.

The estimates have been largely reduced, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia. The first estimates submitted were $117,000,000. Later on the officials of the War Department revised their estimates and cut them down to something like $66,294,114. The committee, after a very careful and thorough hearing further cut those estimates, and this bill carries a little less than $19,000,000.

The original estimates were submitted last fall. A more thorough and more recent consideration of the needs for next year resulted in the officers themselves voluntarily reducing their first estimates in the sum of about $51,000,000, and this very fact emphasizes the very great importance of budget legislation, for if it had been made the duty of some central authority to examine and revise the estimates before they were first submitted, I have no doubt but that not only the reduction named would have been made at that time, but that even greater reductions would have been made and the committee would have been thus aided in its effort to reduce the appropriation to the lowest possible sum consistent with the good of the service.

There are only two features of this bill to which I desire to very briefly call attention. One is in reference to the railway mounts that are provided for in the bill. We have a number of 14-inch guns which were placed in construction during the war which the Government now has on hand and which are not provided with proper mounts or carriages. The department estimated for $3,000,000 to provide 12 railway mounts for 12 of those 14-inch guns. This bill carries a provision which makes it possible to provide three railway mounts or 25 per cent of the amount asked for. My own idea is, and I think the War Department is clearly of that opinion, that more attention should be directed along the line of making our seacoast artillery mobile rather than fixed, and if properly developed along that line it would not only, in my opinion, afford more adequate defense to all portions of the coast line, but in the end it would result in greater economy because we would necessarily be able to do without so great a number of fixed emplacements, cannon, and other methods of coast defense. Gen. Coe stated that 14-inch guns are now considered necessary to an adequate coast defense.

Hence my idea is that, having these 14-inch guns on hand now belonging to the United States Government, something should be done toward putting them into service, so that in the event during the next fiscal year or the year following an enemy should threaten our shores they would be ready for use in order to protect our cities, our harbors, and our coasts.

Unless these guns are provided with mounts they will be entirely useless in the defense of our country. Officers tell us that they are needed and that they are the best type of seacoast guns, having an effective range of 40,000 yards. If the carriages are not provided, they must be stored away, and in case of a sudden or reasonably sudden attack they could not be used in the defense of our country and to prevent an invasion. We have the railroads on the coast and we have the guns. Why not provide railway carriages, so they may be quickly moved here and there and thus afford added protection to our cities and our shore lines with an ultimate less expense?

The other matter to which I wish to call attention is the failure of this bill to make proper provisions for aviation stations at certain fixed emplacements. Two or three years ago the committee recommended and the Congress adopted a provision providing for eight aviation stations. The estimates, submitted with the approval of the Secretary of War, at that time were for 16 of those stations, to be located at various places named. After a consideration of the matter the committee recommended to the Congress that these 16 stations be reduced to 8 stations, and the sum of $8,000,000 was appropriated to construct those 8 aviation stations, it being stated that the stations would cost on an average of a million dollars a piece. The war came on and nothing was done to any extent toward constructing any of those aviation stations. I may say that one was to be constructed at Portland, Me., the nearest port to Europe, one at Boston, Narragansett Bay, the eastern end of Long Island, Staten Island, Langley Field, San Francisco, and Puget Sound, all being places recognized as of very great strategic importance and very liable to attack in case of trouble on either coast.

Mr. SLEMP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. SLEMP. Langley Field had already been constructed out of another appropriation and was not one of the eight.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What was the place, if the gentleman recalls?

Mr. SLEMP. I can not give it, but there were eight besides Langley Field.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am glad to have the gentleman correct me.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Could I inquire if that meant just the station itself?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Just the station—the necessary buildings or barracks and hangars or accessories of an aviation station, including such land as will be required.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. The gentleman may explain later on about the maintenance of these stations, but does that include anything in regard to maintenance?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The sum I have named is the money that will be necessary actually to construct these particular stations for the various balloons and aeroplanes which were to be used. It does not include maintenance.

Mr. SLEMP. To acquire the necessary lands.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And to acquire the necessary lands for the stations, as the gentleman from Virginia suggests. As I stated, due to the war, nothing was done by the service toward establishing those aviation stations, except that negotiations were under way and contracts were actually made for the purchase of some land at an enormous figure up here at Staten Island. That was the status of the matter when the committee met a year ago for the purpose of framing the bill for the current year. It appeared at that time that the service had an unexpended free balance of something like, as I recall, $11,000,000. The subcommittee on fortifications at that time took no action upon the matter, but left that money in the hands of the service for the purpose of constructing these eight stations, which had been theretofore approved by Congress. Under the law as it existed then and under these appropriations as made, the service had authority to acquire the necessary land on which to construct these stations; and all the stations required the purchase of land except the one at San Francisco, which was to be constructed upon a Government reservation at Fort Scott, and a balloon station at Narragansett Bay, where the Government already owned the necessary land. So at the time the last fortification bill passed the service had sufficient money with which to erect these stations and to acquire the necessary land——

Mr. OGDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. OGDEN. If this bill should pass, it would not be declaratory of a policy to decrease the number of stations from eight to three, would it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. I do not think it would necessarily declare that that was the policy of the Congress, but that would be the result so far as the next fiscal year is concerned.

Mr. OGDEN. There are two of those stations uncompleted, I believe?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. OGDEN. Would it not be advisable to permit them to be completed or advanced further in the course of completion before providing for additional stations?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I do not think it is necessary to permit those stations to advance toward completion before providing for these other stations, because those who appeared before the committee stated——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. EAGAN. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SLEMP. Would the gentleman also incorporate in his statement there the amount that would be expended at Staten Island and at the Presidio?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am coming to that.

That was the status of the matter when last July Congress passed the Army appropriation bill, in which a provision was included directing that no appropriation for military purposes should be expended for the purchase of land unless it had theretofore been contracted for. The service therefore found it was in the situation after the passage of that bill that it could not acquire the necessary land at five of these stations, and the result was that it has not been able to do anything in the past year toward completing the stations at those places. It had acquired, as I say, the land at Staten Island. The Government owned land at Langley Field. It owns land at San Francisco, on which the station there is to be constructed, but it did not own the land required at Puget Sound, Portland, Me., Boston, or Narragansett Bay, or on the eastern end of Long Island, and the service found itself unable to expend the money which had been provided for this particular purpose. Gen. Menoher came before the committee and asked it to reappropriate the sum then in hand and authorize the purchase of the necessary land, which amounted to less than $600,000 in all. The committee declined to reappropriate the money in hand, amounting to something like $9,000,000 or more.

Mr. SLEMP. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. SLEMP. The free balance is not $9,000,000 but $6,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand. The $9,000,000 includes $2,000,000 and some hundred thousand dollars of money already obligated, and certain reservations, which can and will be used at Staten Island and San Francisco, and $6,710,000 in round numbers—a free balance in the Treasury. So the result is that the service will be deprived of $6,710,000 with which to continue the construction of these aviation stations at the points named. And Congress, by the adoption of this bill, will to that extent for the next fiscal year repeal its former action, when it authorized and directed the construction of eight aviation stations.

Now, gentlemen, it is unnecessary for me to talk to you about the importance of aviation stations where you have guns which have a range all the way from 15,000 to 60,000 yards. As was stated, the 16-inch guns that are placed at some of these stations, and which are proposed to be placed at others, have an effective range of 50,000 to 60,000 yards.

If it was important to permit the work to go on at Staten Island and San Francisco, which are provided with 12-inch guns, then it is equally important to have the stations provided for at the other five places, which are also provided with 12-inch guns. On the other hand, if these stations are not needed at the five places, then they are not needed at the three places referred to, and it is useless and wasteful extravagance to permit the expenditure of two and a half millions of dollars in their construction. It will possibly take two years to complete all of this work. If they are needed to adequately defend these places, then we are assuming a great risk, just as the man who neglects to insure his building for two years takes the chance of losing his all when he least expects it. Fortifications are said to be our second line of defense. The Navy is the first, although it was stated by a very high officer that in 15 or 20 years the airplanes would constitute the first line of defense and navies would be obsolete. If our Navy is dispersed or if it is at some other place along our long coast line when enemy ships appear, then the defense rests wholly with the fortification defenses. If an enemy ship stands off 40,000 yards and out of range of direct observation and begins to bombard centers of population, to enable our gunners to shoot effectively you must give them the eyes to locate the ship and observe the effectiveness of their shots. This can only be done by directional wireless telegraphy from airplanes. Hence, I repeat that these five stations, including Portland, Boston, and Puget Sound, must be equipped with airplanes before it can be said that they are anything like adequately protected. The last Congress provided for the adequate protection of these places. This bill withdraws that protection, and as a result no steps will be taken at least during the next fiscal year to make the defenses at these places adequate and effective. We must rely on Army officers as to what is necessary to make our seacoast fortifications effective. They state that these long-range guns are useless without airplanes.

Mr. EAGAN. Is it not a fact that if the money is reappropriated they can then use the major part of it, if not all of it, in this work during the coming fiscal year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is my understanding. It would certainly start, and a great deal of it would be completed, if not all of it.

These 14-inch guns have an effective range of 40,000 yards, and the 12-inch guns a range of 27,500 yards, far beyond the range of direct observation, and unless you provide aeroplanes by which the fire can be directed by wireless, to enable those in charge of these guns to know where the target is located, and to know in what direction to shoot, and to know where their shots are landing, these guns are absolutely ineffective, and these defenses are inadequate. So I contend that even though you may have 14-inch guns or 16-inch guns, or even 12-inch guns at Portland or Boston and these other important places, unless you give them the aeroplanes to serve as the eyes with which to see the target and know in what direction to range their guns they will prove absolutely inadequate and ineffective. And that was the testimony submitted by Gen. Menoher and Gen. Mitchell, who appeared before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would appreciate it if the gentleman would give me five minutes more.

Mr. EAGAN. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Gen. Menoher, when asked about it, made this statement:

> I think that matter has been gone into very carefully not only at the time they were originally proposed but since then, and I do not think there is any division of opinion as to the necessity for air defense at those various points. Later on it will probably be desirable to extend this service to some other stations along the coast.
> Mr. SLEMP. These particular stations are subordinate to the coast defenses proper, and are not looked upon as major projects?
> Gen. MENOHER. No, sir.
> Mr. SLEMP. It does not involve powerful battle planes or the equipment of this service with such airplanes as you would have in the Navy?
> Gen. MENOHER. No, sir; not at all.
> Mr. SLEMP. It would include the offensive power——
> Gen. MENOHER (interposing). Equipping the Nation with the air weapons like you would have the Navy, for instance.
> Mr. SLEMP. Equipping with air weapons like the naval vessels are equipped?
> Gen. MENOHER. Yes, sir.

Gen. MITCHELL. That is really a part of the Coast Artillery; the Coast Artillery could not function without this air service.

Mr. BYRNS. It is the eyes to them?

Gen. MITCHELL. Yes; this has nothing to do with the other air defenses of the country.

Gen. MENOHER. Now, it is a well-known fact, well known to every artilleryman, that there is no use shooting your guns unless you can see where the shells are falling, unless you are firing from a big vessel lying 30 or 40 miles out of New York and having them hit Manhattan Island, say. So it is necessary, in order that the coast defenses may function efficiently, to have eyes, as Mr. BYRNS suggested.

* * * * * * *

Gen. MENOHER. Yes, sir. Actual construction on the major portion of these projects had to be postponed on account of the fact that the Army appropriation act approved July 9, 1919, prohibited the expenditure of funds on hand for the purchase of land, notwithstanding the fact that Congress had specifically given authority for the purchase of land for these stations.

Mr. SLEMP. They gave that, though, General, with the restriction that wherever possible these stations should be put on land already owned by the Government, and that no new land should be acquired except with the actual approval of the Secretary of War.

Gen. MENOHER. That is correct; and all these so-called lighter-than-air stations mentioned in here—the balloon base lines—except one, are on Government-owned land. The one for which new land is required is the balloon base line at Narragansett Bay. We wish to purchase a small tract of land at Sachuset Neck and on the western shore of Narragansett Bay near Fort Kearney, and they are the only ones that are on land to be purchased, the only ones of the lighter-than-air stations.

Hence the necessity for continuation of the appropriation and the authority to purchase land which is now being sought. That is the whole object of our hearing. The project on which these funds have been obligated, reserved, or on which it is proposed to apply the free balances, have not been hastily prepared; but, on the contrary, are the result of a definite and careful study made by the Army and Navy prior to the war for the purpose of carrying into effect the functions of coastal air service assigned to the Army in the report of the joint Army and Navy board dated March 12, 1917, and as redefined and reapproved by the joint board January 22, 1920. These projects have had the definite sanction of Congress, as indicated by appropriations made therefor in 1917 and 1918.

So that if Gen. Menoher and Gen. Mitchell and other officers who appeared before the committee know what they are talking about, it is clear that these places to which I have referred, where defense was considered so necessary that 12 and 14 inch guns have been placed, should also be provided with proper air service. The city of Portland, the nearest port to Europe; the great city of Boston and Narragansett Bay, the eastern end of Long Island, and Puget Sound on the west during the next fiscal year will not have that amount of construction which those qualified to speak say is necessary to adequately defend and protect them from the incursions of an enemy; and when you take into consideration the fact that it did not require the appropriation of a single dollar of money, but simply the reappropriation of money already appropriated and in the Treasury, it is really false economy not to give them the money with which to provide this adequate defense. [Applause.]

Not only these stations should be provided for, but there should be some on the southern coast, which will prove an inviting point of attack in event of trouble with a formidable naval power. I do not favor a large standing Army, but in the absence of a covenant or a league of peace with the other nations of the world, I do believe that an efficient Navy and adequate coast defenses along the great length of our coast line must be maintained in the interest of our future safety and security. This bill fails to carry the reappropriation referred to because of the desire of the Republican majority to make a record of economy before the next election. They know full well that it will not save the people one cent, for the appropriation will be made next year, but in the meantime credit will be taken for the saving of the amount of money necessary to construct these stations. It is but another evidence of the hypocrisy of the majority and its readiness to sacrifice for the time being not only efficiency and the proper service of the Government to its citizens but also to risk our national security and defense in the hope of securing political advantage through its alleged claims of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, referring to the bill now under discussion, H. R. 13555, it seems to me that the membership of this House and the people of this country are to be congratulated upon the work of this subcommittee under its able chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP]. And it seems to me that it must be apparent to the people of this country that this House under its able leadership is really practicing the strictest economy, inasmuch as every appropriation bill that has been brought in during this session of Congress has been greatly reduced as compared to the estimates presented by the various department heads. And notwithstanding these great reductions that have been made by the various appropriation committees, every necessary activity of these various departments has been cared for by appropriations not only sufficient to operate them successfully in peace time, but in most cases the appropriations are more than double what they were in the days before the Great War.

In this particular bill the original estimate of the department was, in round numbers, $117,000,000, subsequently reduced to $66,000,000; and as the bill is presented to us it carries $18,000,000, or $98,000,000 less than the original estimate. It will be seen that the amount appropriated in the bill is approximately three times the average amount appropriated annually for a period of years before the war.

I have always been an advocate of sufficient appropriations to put not only the borders of our own country but the borders of our colonies in proper defensive position. I believe that this measure carries a full and adequate amount for all necessary purposes in peace time and will eventually bring our fortifications up to a standard that will make them approximately impregnable.

Another feature of this bill which is very attractive to me is the fact that it requires there should be covered into the Treasury, upon its approval, over $800,000,000 of unobligated balances of appropriations heretofore made for fortifications, and that the appropriations provided for in this bill are for the coming fiscal year only. I think it is highly proper legislation that appropriations should not, except for emergencies, be made immediately available. Neither should appropriations, in my judgment, be made available until expended.

I think the committee has shown great wisdom in this respect and I have no doubt that it will bring about great savings to the country in the future.

The watchword of this House during this session has been "economy," and, in my judgment, it is the most important word of all, and we should keep it always in mind, and every estimate should be cut to the actual needs of the project in hand. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. EAGAN. I understood I was to have the opportunity of yielding time next.

Mr. SLEMP. My understanding was that the gentleman to whom time would be yielded would follow the gentleman from Connecticut.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I request that during my preliminary statement I be not interrupted. When I pass from this I shall court interruption and shall be glad to have as many questions asked as possible.

Mr. BLANTON. But before the gentleman begins the preliminary statement will he permit an interruption?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I just want to commend the aproposness of the gentleman's subject; that is, our defensive problems, following our action of yesterday. It comes in very appropriately.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from Texas is right, because I speak for a peace-time military program. The gentleman should recall that, according to the teachings of our first President, in peace is the time to make preparation for war. It is for such preparation as I believe our first President would approve that I speak.

I would next apologize for the small number of my exhibits, but perhaps they are sufficient to defend myself against the somewhat attenuated audience that I must face. I hope to have time in which to explain the exhibits, although the time granted to me is only half what I had expected.

Mr. Chairman, I would tell very briefly a mere fragment of the story of a great giant who was drawn into mortal combat at a time when he had failed to take care to keep his armor and weapons in order. I would call to mind as a lesson to be remembered how he was compelled to spend almost $25,000,000,000 in preparation for the conflict, how more than a quarter of this fabulous sum was spent for ordnance material alone, and how not even a tithe of the material for which it was expended was ready in time to be of use in the struggle.

One of the most outstanding facts in connection with our participation in the Great War is that the United States had to spend seven billions of dollars for ordnance material and airplanes that had not yet materialized when the war closed, while we fought the war with about a half a billion dollars worth of ordnance purchased from France and Great Britain.

Let it be understood at the outset that what I am saying is not in criticism of anyone, but rather by way of recalling a few well-authenticated facts for the purpose of setting them down for the guidance of those who come after us. I feel that it is a great pity that no one has yet attempted to set out with historical accuracy what we did in the war and how we did it, and at the same time set out with equal care the things we failed to do and the reasons why we failed. It would be an interesting as well as valuable historical document.

We are now in the midst of the great quadrennial contest for control of the civil side of government for the next four years. It is a time when men are prone to point with pride or to view with alarm according to their political leaning. In what I shall say to-day there will be no time consumed in doing either of these things except so far as the facts themselves may serve that purpose.

I have feared that between those who seek only to praise and glorify all that took place during the war and those who are disposed to find fault with everything that was done, those who come after us will not get an accurate picture of what happened. So far as I am able to make it so that picture shall be not only accurate but constructively helpful to the student of these matters in the years to come.

I was much impressed a few weeks ago by some remarks of the very able gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. Referring to the so-called embalmed-beef episode of the Spanish War, he unsparingly disapproved of those who in such great crises would make such petty scandals their stock in trade political argument. I thoroughly agree with him. Nothing makes me more inexpressibly weary than the inane cry of "embalmed beef" made occasionally by some ignorant partisan who seeks thereby to cast discredit upon those who had the task of carrying on the Spanish War. Even if the beef were all that the yellow journals described it to be—and it was not, for I was there and both saw it and ate it—still it would probably not rightfully discredit more than a single careless inspection officer. No sensible person would claim that it involved Secretary of War Alger or President McKinley.

I happen to know upon first-hand information of an instance in France of beef known to be scarcely fit for human food, which was nevertheless issued to soldiers and eaten by them. I refer to this case here because it happens to relate to beef. It was far worse than was ever charged against the embalmed beef of 1898, and I think the officers responsible should have been called to account if possible. Yet who would be so silly as to charge or to think for a moment that Secretary Baker or the administration of his party had anything whatever to do with such dereliction of duty. Such instances could probably be multiplied in this and every other war. It is nauseating to see partisans trying to make political capital out of such occurrences, whether they be sheer accidents or careless blunders on the part of some subordinate official.

In an undertaking so stupendous as our preparation for participation in the Great War there were inevitably both wonderful achievements and colossal blundering, more than enough of either to consume all the time that a busy House or an impatient public would spare to a speaker or writer on the subject. There were a great number of noteworthy performances which entitle those responsible for them to lasting credit and renown, and should assure them grateful remembrance by the American people. Among these none are entitled to greater credit than officers of the Ordnance Department. It would be pleasant to speak of the achievements only, but to do so would be to ignore some of the most useful and needful lessons of the entire war.

I shall speak for the most part of arms, ammunition, and other essential weapons of warfare, articles usually included under the term ordnance and used in fighting. Instead of trying to cover the entire field of ordnance, which is now a very broad field, I shall take a sufficient number of essential articles to serve as types of the whole.

If I needed a text for my remarks, Kipling's oft-quoted "Lest We Forget" would serve appropriately. During the years 1917 and 1918 we were taught, at most fearful cost, some very important lessons, which it would be a great pity, in fact, a calamity, for us to forget. As many of you will readily recall, for some time prior to our entering the war it was my privilege, as I conceived it my duty, to stand upon this floor and try to explain to my colleagues our true situation with regard to the very vital subject of national defense. I sought to make clear what our plight must inevitably be should war come. Not content with calling attention to the condition and to the probable consequences if not remedied, I went further, and attempted in some measure to point the way toward a possible solution of the problem. Whatever might have been the final results of efforts along this line, war came too soon to permit the fruition of any adequate plan.

It is therefore well to admit the fact, quite discreditable to us as a progressive Nation, that at the outbreak of the war in Europe we were woefully unprepared for war, whether it should be for attack or defense. I am not going into the controversy as to who was most to blame for this condition of affairs. In certain important respects, to which I shall refer later, we were somewhat better prepared when the war came to us in 1917. As a Government we can claim no credit whatever for this improvement in our situation, for even in the face of a world conflagration, liable to reach us at any time, we, as a Government, sat supine and did nothing toward increasing or improving our fire-extinguishing apparatus until the flames actually reached us.

Assistant Secretary of War Crowell, in his book on America's munitions, says:

> When the war touched us our strategical equipment included plans ready drawn for the mobilization of men. They were on file at the Army War College in Washington; detailed plans for defending our harbors, our coasts, and our borders. There were also certain plans for the training of new troops.
> It is worthy of note, however, that this equipment included no plan for the equally important and equally necessary mobilization of industry and production of munitions, which proved to be the most difficult phase of the actual preparations for war.

There should have been such plans. Students of military problems, outside as well as inside of the War Department or the Army, not only saw that this would be the more difficult phase of preparation but had called attention to the fact.

Assistant Secretary Crowell further says:

> The war taught us that America can organize, train, and transport troops of a superior sort at a rate which leaves far behind any program for the manufacture of munitions.

This is absolutely true in the situation this country was in when war came, but it ought not to be true and would not be true if we had a proper plan and the necessary preliminary preparation.

The Assistant Secretary also informs us that the war upset the previous opinion that adequate military preparedness is largely a question of trained man power.

Many of you can testify that I had been for several years before the war thoroughly trying my throat and lungs, as well as the patience of my fellow Members of this House, in a continuous effort to uproot any such opinion.

When the war came to us in 1917 it was also the prevailing popular belief that not many men would be required of us, but that our great and important part of the joint task would be to furnish munitions, which we were supposed to be able to provide without stint. Exactly the reverse happened. American men were most needed. We sent men in surprising numbers, and, strangest of all, they had to fight with foreign-made munitions.

Again, I say that there is no disposition on my part to find fault or criticize. Given the situation as it existed when we entered the war, the result was the natural, almost inevitable, consequence. That it is a fact, however, that our men had to use foreign-made munitions can not be controverted.

Maj. Gen. William J. Snow, Chief of Field Artillery, in his report of the activities of this arm of the service during the war, says:

> One of the great lessons that our people should learn from this war is that it requires much time to manufacture guns. On November 11, 1918, with the exception of twenty-four 8-inch howitzers, manufactured upon plans which had been used by the Midvale Steel Co. in the construction of howitzers for the British Government, there was not in the firing line a single field or heavy artillery gun manufactured for us in the United States after our entrance into the war—a period of 19 months. Had it not been for the matériel furnished us by the French and the British it is believed that the war would have been lost.

In making recommendations for the future based upon the experience of the war Gen. Snow makes this additional statement along the same line:

> It is indispensable that an adequate reserve of material and equipment, particularly of ordnance, for our needs upon the outbreak of war be accumulated and maintained in time of peace. Had we not been able to obtain ordnance from the French and the British we would have been a negligible factor in the war until the end of 1918. When the armistice went into effect, 19 months after we entered the struggle, with the exception of twenty-four 8-inch howitzers made from British plans by the Midvale Steel Co., we had in line not one single piece of divisional, corps, or army artillery manufactured in America after our entry into the war.

Gen. Pershing in his final report says:

> The task of the Ordnance Department in supplying artillery was especially difficult. In order to meet our requirements as rapidly as possible we accepted the offer of the French Government to supply us with the artillery equipment of seventy-fives, 155-millimeter howitzers, and 155-millimeter G. P. F. guns from their own factories for 30 divisions. The wisdom of this course was fully demonstrated by the fact that, although we soon began the manufacture of these classes of guns at home, there were no guns of American manufacture of the calibers mentioned on our front at the date of the armistice.

It is a familiar saying that hindsight is better than foresight. As we look back now we can see numerous places where mistakes occurred. Unfortunate decisions were made among the many and momentous decisions necessary to be made. Incorrect estimates were made and acted upon with the inevitable result. Unexpected difficulties were encountered, causing heartrending delays. Inexperience explains many untoward happenings. Remember that there were less than a hundred ordnance officers at first and 11,000 at the end of the war. Some of them were doubtless poor officers, not only inefficient but incompetent and incapable. It would have been a miracle had it been otherwise. It is pleasant to believe, as I do believe from personal knowledge of hundreds of representative ordnance officers met during the war, that no arm of the service produced a more efficient or competent personnel.

To the lasting credit of the Ordnance Department it should be said that its spokesmen did not indulge in any optimistic dreams that were put forth as promises. It was stated quite frankly at the outset that so far as guns for the Artillery and shells for the guns were concerned it would be 1919 before they would be well started in quantity production and that the full program would not be in operation prior to October 1, 1919. While seemingly insurmountable difficulties were encountered, this promise was more than kept, so that in a number of cases guns and shells were beginning to come through before November, 1918, though not in quantities that were adequate

The story of our preparation for the war may be summed up and explained in a few sentences. We declared war on April 6, 1917, and Germany signed the armistice on November 11, 1918. We raised and trained an Army of 4,000,000 men, who by their deeds of valor turned the scale of war during the last six months. No praise can be too extravagant for such a performance. Within a period of a little more than 12 months we had created from our raw material of American manhood a substantial force of men ready for the final training to be acquired only by contact with the enemy. What of the weapons and other material with which they must fight? These things we did not have, and it was not physically possible to produce them, or any substantial part of them, within 12 months. We entered upon the task with a will and determination worthy of a great people engaged in a noble cause and without regard as to what it might cost, but neither high and noble zeal nor all the gold of Ophir can accomplish the impossible. Nineteen months passed and the war ceased without our front-line troops having seen, in the shape of fighting material, the results of our great labor and expense.

The cause is not far to seek. The arms and ammunition used in modern warfare are as a rule complicated and delicate machines. To be effective they must function with precision. To produce such articles requires time. Above all, the preparation of the tools, inspection devices, and other special appliances necessary for the accurate and rapid production of such articles not only requires time but technical skill possessed by a comparatively limited number of men. Herein lay the worm at the core of such small preparation as we had hitherto made for national defense. When the crisis came there was no provision for a rapid expansion of production, and the expenditure of no amount of money whatsoever could then make up the loss.

In one important instance, to which I have already alluded, we were saved in large measure from the legitimate consequences of our own lack of wisdom and foresight. I refer to the production of shoulder rifles. We had developed the best service rifle in the world—the new Springfield—and through a number of years had accumulated a total supply of about 600,000 of these rifles. This number now seems small, but the substantial ground for criticism lies not in the small number on hand but in lack of capacity for producing more if needed. Probably the maximum capacity of our two small arsenals under any condition would not have exceeded 1,200 rifles per day. I should say that the capacity was not limited by buildings, machinery, or men, but largely by the lack of special tools, dies, gauges, and fixtures, which it was estimated would require at least 18 months to produce. Therefore had it been necessary to fight the war with our own excellent rifles it would have been necessary for us to persuade the enemy to wait 18 months, until we were ready to produce rifles.

Fortunately for us our private manufacturers were called upon to make rifles for Europe.

The allied countries able to reach America came here for munitions. They had the right to come, and our industries had the right to supply them. It proved to be no easy task. Time was the most essential element involved, for the munitions were sadly needed, but a great deal of time was consumed in making the tools and other devices to which I have referred before our most capable and progressive manufacturers were able to respond to the demand. The primary ordnance essentials at that time as at all times were infantry rifles and cannon, with an abundance of ammunition for both. Early orders were placed in the United States for large numbers of rifles and great quantities of rifle ammunition.

Urgent as was the demand for rifles few were delivered within 18 months. Two years saw the contracts well along, and two and a half years saw them well nigh completed. Full capacity production reached about 15,000 rifles per day. The rifle produced here in greatest quantities was the modified Enfield, which had been designed by the British but not put into production. It was originally designed for a high-power cartridge, much like our own, and therefore could be readily modified to use our ammunition. This was done and proved a veritable godsend to our munitions program. No decision made during the war was more important or far-reaching in its effects.

All the machinery, special tools, fixtures, dies, jigs, and gauges for making the Enfield rifle for Great Britain were in the hands of our manufacturers. It was a comparatively small task to procure such new tools and appliances as were made necessary by the modification to use American ammunition. Within three or four months this was accomplished, and a satisfactory rifle was being turned out in quantities. As I have said, the decision to make and use the modified Enfield rifle chambered for our own ammunition was an important one. Any other would have meant a scarcity of rifles such as Great Britain suffered from during the first two years of the war and a dependence upon our associates in the war for the arm which, although the most essential, is at the same time the most difficult to produce.

The three men who, in my judgment, deserve the highest credit in connection with this momentous decision and for thereafter making the rifle program an unqualified success are Mr. John E. Otterson, president of the Winchester Repeating Arms Co.; Mr. Harry S. Kimball, president of the Remington Arms & Union Metallic Cartridge Co.; and Mr. C. H. Schlachs, general manager of the Eddystone rifle plant. These men are great captains of industry who led others through difficult and baffling problems the right solution of which was absolutely vital. Their preeminent executive ability coupled with technical training of a high order directed along practical lines made their services invaluable in the crisis then at hand.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am very much interested in the gentleman's discussion. I would like to know if any changes were made between the English rifle and our pattern of it?

Mr. TILSON. Only the changes necessary to make it fit our cartridge. Ours is what is known as the .30 caliber, whereas the cartridge used in the British rifle is the .303. Our cartridge case has a cannelure by means of which it is fed into the chamber and ejected after firing, while the British has the old-fashioned rimmed head.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman speaks of the small number of pieces of American-made ordnance that were on the battle front in France at the time of the armistice. Is it not a fact that we sent to France many forgings which materially facilitated the ready production of ordnance so that France could supply it?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; and some to the British. Before we entered the war we were producing ordnance for some of the Allies, and this, of course, we went ahead with. The reason why we completed 24 of the 8-inch howitzers that Gen. Snow speaks of in time to get them to the front was because we already had the plans and were making them for the British.

The point I wish to bring home is the time it takes to develop a gun and put it in actual production. Wherever we were prepared to make guns we did it rapidly. It is the time required for the preparation that looms largest in the way.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. When the gentleman says we were making some ordnance will he particularize who "we" were?

Mr. TILSON. I mean our private manufacturers. Of course, our Government made nothing for foreign Governments. It could not properly do so in time of peace. Our private manufacturers, however, were manufacturing these things. The Midvale and the Bethlehem companies were two concerns that were specially engaged in making the heavy guns, while the three plants to which I have alluded—the Winchester Repeating Arms Co., the Remington Arms & Union Metallic Cartridge Co., the Eddystone plant—and others, were actively engaged in making rifles.

Assistant Secretary Crowell, in his book on American munitions, states clearly why it was necessary to adopt the modified Enfield rifle instead of our own superior Springfield. I quote:

> To produce Springfields on a grand scale in private plants would imply the use of thousands of gauges, jigs, dies, and other small tools necessary for such a manufacture, as well as that of great quantities of special machines. None of this equipment for Springfield rifle manufacture had been provided, yet all of it must be supplied to the commercial plants before they could turn out rifles.

Accurately expressed. His statement as to why this condition of affairs existed is not so fortunate, because it is entirely at variance with the well-authenticated facts. I quote from this statement:

> Why, then, was not the manufacture of Springfields extended to private plants? Some antebellum effort, indeed, had been made looking to the production of Springfields in commercial plants, but lack of funds had prevented more than the outlining of the scheme.

Members will recognize at a glance the old time-worn dodge of trying to lay the blame upon Congress, but it will not work in this case. There was an earnest antebellum effort along the lines indicated by Mr. Crowell in this statement. Many of the present membership of the House will recall the part played in that effort by the Member now addressing you.

Section 123 of the national defense act, which was written by me and placed in the bill as a result of my efforts, and also the appropriation authorized by that section and carried in the Army appropriation bill passed in the summer of 1916, will serve to refresh the memory on this subject. The undisputed facts in the case are that Congress appropriated all the funds for this purpose that the War Department could be persuaded to accept, and that none of the funds appropriated were used. If there be blame in connection with this matter, it should be placed where it properly belongs.

The modified Enfield rifles were produced in sufficient quantities to not delay or hamper military activities in any respect, and as this was the only part of our munitions program of which this could be truly said, we are justified in feeling a reasonable degree of pride in it, although we should recognize the fact, as Mr. Crowell says, that it was due to "a condition in our small-arms industry in early 1917 that now seems to have been well-nigh providential."

In order to give a clearer idea as to just what the problem was and what progress was made toward solving it, I here submit certain tabulated data relating to typical articles in the ordnance program, which will serve to give a general idea of the whole. The tables are, for the most part, taken directly from War Department sources and are substantially accurate, although in some cases the totals of articles completed since the armistice may need to be increased. However, they are sufficiently accurate for present purposes.

Figures concerning the production of airplanes are omitted purposely. There has been so much controversy upon this subject that I doubt if anything I might contribute would furnish additional light, and I do not desire to add anything to the heat of the controversy. It is sufficient for my purpose here to refer to the uncontroverted fact that, although more than a billion of dollars were expended, American-made airplanes did not make their appearance at the fighting front in time to be of any appreciable service in winning the war. I say this because it ought not to be left unsaid in remarks touching upon this subject, having for their purpose, not criticism of the past but the unbiased narration of certain facts which may serve in some small measure as a reliable guide for the future. The national defense through the years to come is for me infinitely more important than the question whether one man may deserve praise or another man deserve blame for something done or something left undone in the war just ended.

Passing rapidly to the statistical charts that I have brought in I shall be compelled to be very brief in explaining them. Fortunately they are largely self-explanatory. After I have referred to them I shall be glad to have anyone ask me questions in regard to them.

In the case of rifles, machine guns, pistols, and revolvers I have shown in the charts the rate of production and the totals. In case of the larger guns and other articles something of the magnitude of the program is shown by giving the number ordered as well as the number completed, whether before or after the war ended.

SERVICE RIFLES.

Chart 1 shows the total rifle production during the period of the war, the period included in the year 1918 being given by months.

It should be understood that the two Government arsenals at Springfield, Mass., and Rock Island, Ill., made and were able to make only the Springfield rifle, while the Winchester, Ilion, and Eddystone plants produced the Enfield.

The time consumed in changing over from the manufacture of the Enfield chambered for British ammunition to the same rifle chambered for American ammunition was so short that it can be explained only by the fact that some of the far-sighted manufacturers evidently discounted the decision to make the change and began preparation in advance of the decision. Winchester made the first delivery of rifles on August 18, 1917, Eddystone on September 10, 1917, and Ilion on or about October 28, 1917.

The small number of Springfield rifles produced at the Government arsenals during the first months after our entry into the war is explained by the considerable number of components produced and used as spare parts to replace defective parts in certain rifles already on hand.

Mr. OGDEN. Does the gentleman expect to insert these charts in the RECORD?

Mr. TILSON. I expect to insert them in the RECORD, where they will serve as a source of information for anybody who may care to examine them.

MACHINE GUNS.

The next subject of which I shall speak is the production of machine guns. Chart II shows the production up to January 1, 1918, in the first column, and after that the total number of guns of all kinds manufactured up to December, 1918. It appears that we had at the first of 1918, 2,031 Vickers guns, 2,500 of the Colt guns, and 2,209 of the Lewis guns, besides 750 of the Lewis guns chambered for the .303 British ammunition. There were a few of the old Benet-Mercier type of gun in the hands of the troops. My own regiment was supposed to be adequately armed with four of these guns during our tour of duty on the Mexican border in 1916.

In May, 1917, it was decided to adopt the Browning gun, the light automatic rifle, and the heavy gun for the field gun, and a supreme effort was begun to put these guns into production. It is almost marvelous that in a single year we were able to produce a few of each type. It was early in May, 1917, when it was decided to adopt this gun. In May, 1918, the Winchester Co., at New Haven, had turned out about 1,200 of the automatic rifles. By June, 1918, the Marlin-Rockwell Co. was ready to begin making them, and by July, 1918, the Colt Co. was producing them. At the end of the war the War Department reported the acceptance of 52,238 of the light Brownings. About 40,000 of the heavy Brownings were accepted during the same period. Do not suppose that any considerable number of these guns reached the firing line. A few of them had finally gotten through to the front, but probably if you ask all the men who served at the front whom you may meet for six months whether they saw a Browning gun, they will all probably tell you that they did not. This is because it took some time to assemble the guns in this country, prepare them for shipment, transport them to Europe, issue them there, and then train the men in the use of them. You must remember that the final campaign of the war began on the 26th of September, 1918, so that practically none of our Browning rifles reached the front in time for effective use. I saw a single report of their use at the front about the middle of September, 1918. The officer who sent in the report was enthusiastic concerning their use.

Mr. McKEOWN. What is the advantage of the Browning gun over the Lewis gun?

Mr. TILSON. It seems to be very generally claimed by our Army ordnance experts that it is superior, and I am prepared to believe that it is a better gun. It is claimed that it operates with less difficulty under all sorts of conditions. The Lewis gun is a good gun, however. My own judgment is that we ought to have produced more Lewis guns and more Marlin guns, not because they were the best that had been designed, perhaps, but because at the time we entered the war they were the only guns that were in actual quantity production in this country. Being the only guns that were in full production so that they could be made rapidly, we should have made more of them. In other words, we should have made the only guns that we could make, and we should have made them rapidly enough to supply our troops in camp for training purposes and at the front for fighting.

Mr. SNYDER. We all have a very high regard for the gentleman's opinion, but when he states that the Browning gun is a better gun than the Lewis gun, he does not state that from actual experience of the two guns, because the facts are that in the war, so far as England and Germany were concerned, there were 50 Lewis guns used to 1 Browning.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from New York is entirely correct, and what I have stated is really the opinion of most of our ordnance people, which I am not prepared to controvert, that the Browning is the superior gun.

Mr. SNYDER. I just want it to appear in the RECORD that the Lewis gun was the gun that was used.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is correct in what he says. The Lewis gun was successfully used in great numbers, while the Browning was not used at all in any appreciable numbers. The Browning gun was not sufficiently tested out in the war itself to enable anyone to say from sufficient actual war experience that it is a superior gun. Upon such tests as it has had it is believed to be a superior weapon.

Mr. SNYDER. The Lewis gun is manufactured in my district, and in view of that fact I am deeply interested in having the facts appear, and I want it clearly in the RECORD that what the gentleman has stated is purely a matter of opinion.

Mr. TILSON. As I have stated, I do not know whether the opinion is correct or not. The criticism that, in my judgment, should be made is not as to whether the gun adopted was superior or inferior to some other, but of the fact that we waited for the development and preparation to manufacture a gun that required a full year before we could make it at all. I think that just as soon as we entered the war we ought to have procured all the Lewis guns possible by every possible means. We did buy them later on and used them as flexible guns in the Air Service, but we should have had more as we went along of both the Lewis and the Marlin guns.

Mr. SNYDER. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. TILSON. A few words in regard to the Marlin gun. As I have stated, the Marlin gun was the only other machine gun in production on a large scale. For certain reasons of a mechanical character the Vickers gun had never been put into production on a large scale; hence the Lewis and Marlin guns were the only American guns available for our needs. For our ground fighting in France we chose to rely upon the French Hotchkiss and Chaucat automatic, both using French ammunition. The merits of the Marlin gun were slow to be recognized by the Ordnance Department. The Air Service required for use on the tractor type of airplane, most used in France, a machine gun capable of being synchronized so as to shoot between the swiftly rotating blades of the propeller. The Marlin was found to fill the bill admirably. It was first ordered as a stop-gap, proved to be satisfactory, and finally received the most enthusiastic approval. As early as February, 1918, Gen. Pershing cabled as follows:

Marlin aircraft guns have been fired successfully on four trips, 13,000–15,000 feet altitude and at temperature of −20° F. On one trip guns were completely covered with ice. Both metallic link and fabric belts proved satisfactory.

Again, just before the armistice, Gen. Pershing cabled:

Marlin guns now rank high as any with pilots and are entirely satisfactory.

The French Government tried them out also and declared them to be the equal of the Vickers.

PISTOLS AND REVOLVERS.

Now, I pass to pistols and revolvers. Chart III shows the production of automatic pistols and revolvers during the period of the war. Prior to the war only about 20 per cent of our enlisted personnel were armed with the pistol. As soon as our troops got into actual fighting it was found that the pistol, especially the automatic pistol used in our Army, was a great life saver as well as a great life destroyer as used by our men. It proved to be a fine weapon to fight with, and it was at once decided that a very much larger percentage of our troops should be armed with the pistol. Every effort was made to enlarge the capacity for the manufacture of the automatic pistol. When it was found to be impossible to get the tools, gauges, jigs, and other necessary things to increase production capacity sufficiently in time for the purpose, it was decided to include revolvers in the program. Several types of revolvers were used, including the old-type Colt, the new-type Colt, the Smith & Wesson, and others. In fact, it was a case of accepting almost anything that would shoot. When the war ended a number of manufacturers in addition to the Colt Company were tooling up for the production of the Colt automatic pistol, notably the Winchester Co.; so that if the war had lasted over into 1919, as it was generally expected it would, our program for pistols would have been well along.

37-MILLIMETER GUN.

In the brief time left I wish to speak for only a moment of the 37-millimeter gun, which is a sort of connecting link between the infantry and the artillery. The 37-millimeter gun is a little under an inch and a half in caliber, or, to be exact, 1.45669 inches. The whole outfit weighs about 340 pounds. It is hauled along by a single horse or mule on a sort of cart. It is so arranged that the wheels and axle can be taken off and left behind. By putting the sponge staff through the barrel two men can carry it, while two other men of the squad carry the trail. The remaining four men of the Infantry squad carry the ammunition. The guns of this type used by our troops were bought from the French. We started to put them in manufacture in this country and had ordered 2,597. These were just beginning to come through at the end of the war. I think that a few of them had been assembled for shipment overseas.

The 37-millimeter was used as an antidote for the "pill boxes" and to clean out machine-gun nests and other strong points of this kind. It was called the Infantry cannon, being used entirely by this arm of the service.

75-MILLIMETER GUN.

The gun that played the largest part of all the field or other heavier guns in the war was the 75-millimeter gun. Its importance is indicated by the fact that it makes up numerically practically one-half the artillery program and requires very much more than half the total number of rounds of ammunition. Prior to the war no one outside of a few French ordnance officers had ever seen the 75-millimeter gun—that is, the interior of it—although it is not a new gun, being known as the 1897 model. The secret of the recoil mechanism had been preserved for 20 years, carefully kept from the public and from everyone except a few special ordnance officers in the French Army.

[1] 19 model 1916 and 124 British model were sent to France for training purposes.

The recoil mechanism of the 75-millimeter and other guns of its general type is called the recuperator. Something of this kind is necessary to absorb and neutralize the tremendous force of reaction caused by firing the piece. The French believe, and this belief was quite generally concurred in, that the recuperator of the famous 75 was the most perfect and effective in the world. As I have said, its secret had been carefully guarded for years. French joy at our coming into the war was manifested, among other ways, by turning over to us without restriction the wonderful 75 with its marvelous recuperator. A first study of the mechanism led to an attempt to Americanize the method of production, which was not entirely successful. American perseverance finally overcame all obstacles, so that a considerable number of these recuperators were finally completed; but, like most of our other preparations made after the war began, they came too late to be of service in the war.

4.7-INCH GUNS.

Charf V shows the number of 4.7-inch gun units ordered and the number finally completed:

CHART V.

[1] 16 of these units were floated for overseas up to Nov. 11, 1918.

The 4.7-inch gun is the one weapon used in the war with which our troops were familiar. We had the stupendous number of 48 of these guns when the war began, only a fractional part of the number needed for training purposes alone. Sixteen more were completed in time to be sent to France before November 11, 1918. Had the war lasted until the spring of 1919, an appreciable number of these guns would have been on the firing line. Orders were given early for the guns, carriages, caissons, and limbers, but the usual difficulties were encountered, and some additional ones, so that deliveries had only just begun when the war ended. One of the serious difficulties was the result of the great difference in cross section between the breech and muzzle ends, which made difficult the proper necessary heat treatment.

The 4.7-inch gun, with its heavier missile and longer range, was counted upon for very effective use against the German 77. With a 60-pound projectile and an elevation of 15 degrees, the 4.7 has a range of 4½ miles. By using a 45-pound projectile and the same angle of elevation, the range can be increased to 5½ miles. A still greater range is possible by depressing the trail into a hole in the ground, thus giving a still greater angle of elevation. A new design of carriage with a split trail, giving both a wider traverse and a greater elevation, was developed, and the first one was undergoing tests at the proving grounds when the war ended.

155-MILLIMETER HOWITZERS.

Like most of the best weapons used in the war, the 155-millimeter howitzer was not a new weapon. With the famous 75 it shares the great honor of being one of the most used as well as most useful weapons used in the war. It was designed and manufactured by the great firm of Schneider et Cie. and considered by the French as one of the finest examples of the gun builder's art. American skill rose to the occasion, however, and duplicated it quite successfully, though not in time to be sent to France. Since the armistice a considerable number of these howitzers have been completed, as shown in Chart VI. These will doubtless serve as an important part of our armament in any future program of preparedness.

The 155-millimeter howitzer weighs less than 4 tons and is conveniently mobile. The projectile used weighs 95 pounds and its range is more than 7 miles. The recuperator is of the hydropneumatic type and returns the piece into battery quickly, making it possible to fire several shots per minute.

155-MILLIMETER G. P. F. GUNS.

The same difficulties were met and the same obstacles had to be overcome in reproducing the 155-millimeter G. P. F. guns in the United States as were encountered in duplicating or reproducing in any form the other French types of weapon. One of these monsters complete weighs 20,000 pounds. It hurls a 95-pound projectile more than 10 miles. Motor traction is used and an additional caterpillar arrangement is designed which makes it possible to traverse soft ground. It has a split trail, a very low carriage, a wide angle of traverse, and a high angle of elevation.

[1] 16 were actually floated to be equipped with recuperators in France.

Our program for the production of this gun [Chart VII] was quite ambitious, but like the others did not materialize in time. It is expected that a total of nearly 1,000 of these huge pieces will be completed and become a most valuable part of our permanent armament. A later report than that given in the chart shows 954 units have been completed and that 39 more are to be completed later.

8 AND 9.2 INCH HOWITZERS.

The 8-inch howitzer has the honor of being the only piece of American ordnance manufactured in the United States during the period of the war to make its appearance on the fighting line in Europe before November 11, 1918. On April 14, 1917, just eight days after our entry into the war, an order for 80 of these howitzers was placed with the Midvale Steel Co., which had been producing the same gun for Great Britain. In consequence of this fortunate circumstance the Chief of Field Artillery was able to state in his report that six batteries of this gun were in line on the day the armistice was signed.

CHART VIII.

[1] 96 of the Mark VI 8-inch howitzers were shipped overseas before the close of the war, of which 24 reached the front before the armistice.

The 9.2-inch British howitzer is only a fraction of an inch less in caliber than the 240-millimeter French howitzer, and is not considered equal to the French weapon in any respect. The British were supplying us with this type. It might seem strange that in addition to our somewhat liberal program for the 240-millimeter we should also order 100 of the 9.2's to be made in this country.

A sufficient explanation lies in the fact that the Bethlehem Steel Co. had been making this gun for Great Britain and was ready to produce them. With this capacity available it was deemed the part of wisdom to utilize it. Therefore an order was given to the Bethlehem Steel Co. for 100 guns of this type. None of them were finished in time for use abroad.

240-MILLIMETER HOWITZERS.

Although but a fraction of an inch larger than the British 9.2 and still in the same class as the British 8-inch, nevertheless it was believed that the French 240-millimeter howitzer was so much superior to the other two that it was adopted. A glance at Chart IX will disclose something of the magnitude of the undertaking. To Watertown Arsenal alone was allotted $17,500,000 as the estimated expense for turning out 250 gun carriages complete for the 240-millimeter howitzer. Another order for nearly four times as many more gun carriages of the same kind was given to the Standard Steel Car Co. One unit was completed before the armistice, but was not sent abroad.

The exact size of the 240-millimeter is 9.45 inches. The projectile weighs 356 pounds and carries a bursting charge of almost 50 pounds of high explosive. Its range is about 10 miles. By separating the complete unit into four parts, each part can be drawn by a 10-ton tractor, thus rendering the weapon mobile. A small crane is carried along for use in setting up the gun.

RAILWAY ARTILLERY.

The program for railway artillery in the war was one of mounting guns already in existence. The task was one of such magnitude as to require time beyond what the period of the war afforded. The Ordnance Department took up the task in a large way and some noteworthy results were achieved, but the same story must be told as in the case of nearly all of our gun program—the war ended before any of the guns were on the fighting line.

The 7-inch Navy guns were not intended for use overseas, but were mounted for the protection of our own seacoast against the heavy guns of the German submarines.

There were available, that could be spared from our seacoast defenses, ninety-six 8-inch guns of 35-caliber length. It was decided to construct 47 mounts. Three large contractors attempted the job and made such progress that three complete units were shipped overseas. These mounts were equipped to run on either the standard gauge or the omnipresent 60-centimeter road of the fighting zone. If the war had lasted till the spring of 1919 it is believed that these guns would have proved a factor.

[1] Mortars.

There were 129 of the seacoast 10-inch guns of 34-caliber length available for war use. It was decided to mount 36 of them on the Schneider sliding mount and 18 on the Batignolles type of mount. Three large contractors undertook the work of fabricating the parts of the Schneider mounts to be assembled in France. A few parts had been fabricated before the armistice. None of either type were finished, and the contracts were canceled.

Of the 12-inch guns found to be available for mounting 6 were being made here for the Republic of Chile when we came into the war. Their great length, 50 calibers, gave them a very long range. Three mounts were ordered and almost completed before the armistice. One of these mounts requires four railway cars, has a total length of 105 feet, and weighs 600,000 pounds.

One of the biggest jobs of the entire program was the mounting of the 12-inch mortars. The buildings and tools for a single plant cost $3,500,000. When the armistice was signed the castings, forgings, and structural parts were ready and 45 units were completed later.

None of the 14-inch Navy guns were finally mounted by the Army, and the contracts were canceled after the armistice. Under the supervision of the Navy Ordnance Bureau 11 of these guns, on hand before the war, were mounted on railway cars, and later on 6 of them were turned over to the Army. These 6 guns figured as the only very large semimobile artillery of American make on the line during the war.

There was one American 16-inch howitzer forged, finished, and ready for mounting at the outbreak of the war. It was decided to place this monster on a railway mount and use it in France, but it was not finished in time.

TANKS.

It does not seem to be fully settled just who it was who first invented the tank, if, indeed, it can be properly called an invention. An American contrived the caterpillar tractor. A Frenchman claims the honor of evolving the portable fortress to be carried by the tractor. The British were the first to use it in the famous drive at Cambrai.

[1] 6 Renault and 10 Ford tanks were shipped to France.

No manufacturer in America knew anything at all about producing tanks. Fortunately they do not come within the same class with guns for difficulty of production. I shall therefore make but brief reference to them here.

It was first decided to equip our forces with two sizes of tanks. The very large British tank had proved satisfactory in battle, so it was adopted for the large size, while the 6-ton Renault used by the French was accepted for the smaller type. A working agreement was made with the British by which we furnished the engines and driving mechanism, while Great Britain furnished the hull, guns, and ammunition. The wisdom of this arrangement is apparent. We could make engines and driving mechanisms, but our production of guns and ammunition had not yet reached a satisfactory stage.

The large tanks had not yet materialized at the time of the armistice, but a few of the smaller size were about ready for use when the end of the war came.

A small 3-ton two-man tank was devised, and the Ford Motor Co. set about building them in the summer of 1918, but only a few were completed and none in time to be used.

There are many other features of our war-time ordnance problem that I should like to dilate upon, such as trench mortars, grenades, bombs, and many varieties of ammunition, but I have already referred to enough to indicate the general character of the problem. I shall refer to but one thing further, which will serve as typical of the Artillery ammunition program.

75-MILLIMETER HIGH-EXPLOSIVE SHELL.

The high-explosive shell for the 75-millimeter gun will best serve to illustrate the stupendous task of supplying Artillery ammunition, because practically all calibers use the high-explosive shell in part or in whole, and a larger proportion of high-explosive shells were used in the Great War than ever before. A very thorough study of the production of the 75-millimeter high-explosive shell during the war has been made by the statistics branch of the General Staff. The results of this study are embodied in Report No. 5, Statistical Summary Series, a most interesting, illuminating, and valuable document, the examination of which is recommended to anyone desirous of a thorough understanding of this subject. I shall submit the substance of but a single page of this report, Chart XII, in order to show the difficulty of keeping to a paper program when laid out in an untried field.

CHART XII.

[1] The Government program called for 20,200,000 complete rounds by Sept. 1, 1918

The program finally adopted called for the production of 20,200,000 complete rounds on September 1, 1918. The different components were assigned to a number of manufacturers, each of whom set to work to turn out his particular part as soon as possible. No one knew just how long it would require. The result is shown in the chart. It shows what might be called a very badly unbalanced program. Primers were easy to make, while boosters were found to be very difficult and slow. Cartridge cases lagged behind primers, but were far ahead of fuses or shells. Since the slowest ship necessarily determines the speed of the entire fleet, so the number of complete rounds must fall below the number of boosters.

On August 1, 1918, a month before the date set for the consummation of the program, primers had been accepted to the number of 22,200,000, or 2,000,000 beyond the mark set, while boosters ready on the same date were only 2,200,000, or 18,000,000 below the program. Meanwhile the number of complete rounds lagged still further behind, with the result that only 1,600,000 rounds of light field gun high-explosive shell of American manufacture reached France, and this arrived so late that practically none of it could be tested, authorized for issue, and used before the armistice was signed.

The report referred to very appropriately adds in connection with the time required to produce the 75-millimeter high-explosive shell—and it applies as well to many other articles—" Some of the causes of the delay in manufacture were peculiar to the circumstances of this war. Others would occur in almost any future war. It is of vital importance for future military plans to know what the causes of delay were, how far they were peculiar to the occasion, and how far common to every program of munition manufacture."

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the charts here displayed by me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by placing some charts in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. I ask for one minute more. [Turning shotgun toward the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. SLEMP. I will yield the gentleman one minute. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILSON. I have brought in as an exhibit the weapon which I now hold in my hand, because it was at one time a matter of international interest. This is the famous sawed-off shotgun, against the use of which the Kaiser protested as not being in accordance with international law. So far as my knowledge of international law goes there is nothing that would prohibit the use of such a gun. It is simply a short shotgun with a bayonet fitted to it. The ammunition used is a cartridge containing nine buckshot. It is by no means a new gun, this one being one of model 1897. It has been called a riot gun, and would doubtless be quite effective for such a purpose. It was probably first intended to be used in France to guard prisoners. It was tried in the trenches and found to be useful in close-range fighting. Gen. Pershing ordered more of them, and there were sent over to him about 30,000 or 40,000 of them. They were not all used for guarding prisoners.

These guns were made by private manufacturers entirely and were never made in the Government arsenals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. EAGAN. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. TILSON. This little gun which I now hold in my hand was captured from the Germans. It is a pistol, using the wooden holster for an extension butt to the stock. Placing it to the shoulder in this way [illustrating] gives the weapon a steadiness in holding and aiming that in shooting gives to it practically the effectiveness of a rifle for short distances. It is one of the very excellent pistols carried by officers of the German Army, and I am told that it is a very accurate-shooting pistol, though I have not yet had the opportunity of trying it out for myself.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. How many cartridges does it carry?

Mr. TILSON. I believe that the chamber and magazine together hold 10 cartridges. I thank the gentleman from New Jersey for yielding to me the extra time and the Members present for their helpful attention. [Applause.]

I would add but a brief conclusion to my remarks. Fortunately the charts which I extend in the RECORD with my remarks speak far more eloquently than any mere words that I might utter. They tell in typical instances something of the story of our mighty, though necessarily hasty and wasteful, effort to prepare for war in time of war. Fabulous as has been the cost it will not have been expended in vain if we and those who come after us shall learn from this experience, and not allow them to be forgotten, the very obvious lessons it has taught.

There were no plans, we are told. The next five years will be the very best years in the century to make plans. The lamp of actual experience, a heart-rending experience in many respects, will be a light to guide us.

Scarcely has the noise of the thundering guns ceased to reverberate along the Meuse before we begin to hear the senseless chatter, time worn and oft refuted, that all wars have now ceased forever. The prophets Isaiah and Micah in identical language foretold the day when men would beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks. This prophecy is now being fulfilled in this country under our very eyes. It was likewise fulfilled after 1865 and again after 1898. In fact, the periodical fulfillment of this beautiful prophecy makes it a somewhat unsafe foundation upon which to build a policy of national defense. Nevertheless we are proceeding upon a theory which for the time being and until war comes fulfills that other prophecy, "Neither shall they learn war any more." Oh, if by simply wishing we could make things so!

Let me not be misunderstood. I would not maintain a huge Military Establishment in time of peace. In fact, I have always favored a small standing Army, knowing full well that in the future as in the past our wars must be fought by citizen soldiers. For their own sakes as well as for the sake of the country whose defense is their most sacred duty they should have the benefit of an elementary military training; but as I have here tried to show, the most serious obstacle to be overcome by us in the Great War was not the lack of trained man power, important as this was. The mobilization of our industries for the production of munitions was the really big problem. The war lasting 19 months was too short to solve it. The return of peace gives another opportunity to attack the problem in an orderly, systematic, and scientific fashion. The future welfare and safety of the Republic demand that we perform our part of the task now. We of this day and time shall prove ourselves unfaithful servants if without an earnest effort to prevent it we permit ourselves to drift back into the same old fool's paradise in which the war found us.

To prevent such a relapse is not so much a matter of expense as it is of attitude on the part of Congress and the people and of far-sighted, practical making of plans, and, so far as may be, carrying them into execution on the part of those charged with responsibility. A tithe of the sum that was wasted in the frenzied effort made during the war if properly expended would go far toward insuring against the possible recurrence of the necessity for such an expenditure. For one, I shall not cease to urge and to assist wherever I may that the house of our national defense be put in order and kept so for the benefit of our own posterity, as well as for the good of all mankind.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Mr. TILSON, Mr. SLEMP, and Mr. EAGAN were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 61 minutes remaining.

Mr. EAGAN. I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

THE COTTON FARMER, THE COST OF PRODUCTION, AND THE PRICE OF HIS PRODUCT.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the merchant properly bases his selling price upon the cost price. Why should not the cotton farmer? If the merchant does not get his price to-day, he rightly holds his goods until to-morrow. Why should not the cotton farmer? The merchant has the goods the people need, the farmer has the cotton the world needs. In the two cases the economic conditions are identical.

Cotton growing is expensive. It demands practically 12 months of the year to grow and harvest a crop. Other crops require much less time. Cotton is the one staple crop that must be cultivated and harvested entirely by human hands. Tobacco is another largely handled by hand. Other crops are cultivated and harvested by machinery. Cotton is planted by hand, or by some simple device requiring the planting of each row separately. It is cultivated by human hands with hoe and plow. It is picked by hand, human fingers touching every lock and boll of the entire crop; then it is loaded on wagons by hand and again handled at the gin, requiring the maximum of human energy. Wheat land is broken by machinery; it requires no cultivation; the crop is harvested by machinery, thrashed and sacked by machinery, requiring the minimum of human labor.

Cotton was originally produced by slaves, when neither the cost of labor nor the living conditions of the laborer were considered an item in the legitimate cost of production. To some extent this conventional opinion prevails to-day among those in the trade who seek cheap cotton and who, while demanding their "pound of flesh," are not humanly interested in removing the wretched privations that were suffered until recently by those who performed the manual labor in the cotton fields.

It has been charged by the press of New England and of Europe that cotton-land owners are making excessive profits, as shown by the great increase of the deposits in southern banks. These critics are evidently ignorant of the fact that, owing to the rich and versatile soils of the South, with a wealth of sunshine and climate, the cotton crops produced last year only one-fifth of the $10,000,000,000 of revenues derived from the southern farms. In the other four-fifths, not in the cotton crops, over 30 per cent of which were produced at loss, are found the profits the South realizes from its agricultural activities. The South is, of course, increasing in wealth and power, but its profits have come not from cotton but from other agricultural products which make cotton growing possible, and from its vast increasing oil, mineral, and timber resources. If the South, deprived of its timber, oil, and minerals, under present high prices of farm equipment and cost and scarcity of labor, were to-day compelled to grow cotton exclusively, even at prices that now prevail, its bank deposits would disappear and bankruptcy would inevitably follow. You may give a young man the best college agricultural education and he can not with his own hands earn a decent living growing cotton alone. He must grow other crops also. Cotton is his cash crop, but under present prices does not yield a profit. The money value of his corn, peas, potatoes, hay, pastures, vegetables, beef, pork, milk, butter, chickens, eggs, interest, taxes, and depreciation of improvements, implements, and live stock, to say nothing of his labor, used during the whole year required in growing and harvesting a cotton crop is greater than the money value of the cotton grown.

CRITICS ANSWERED.

These well-known facts conclusively answer the critics who claim the price of cotton paid the producer is too high. Then, too, authoritative estimates show that of the service men who left the cotton fields to enter the service only one-tenth have returned to cotton production, while there is a steady and increasing movement of laborers from the cotton farms because they can earn from three to four times more in other callings.

The present price of cotton does not permit the cotton-land owner to pay prices sufficiently high to arrest this movement away from the cotton fields. These laborers have not in great numbers left the South. They have only left the cotton fields. The problem that confronts the South and is vital to the world, now in need of clothing, is how to bring this labor back to the cotton fields. It will be illuminating to note that dependable white labor and not uncertain negro labor, as usually presumed, produces the major part of the cotton grown. So in bringing labor back to the cotton farms you are dealing with the dependable white man, the white American, ambitious and resolute in purpose to have a wage and living conditions equal to men in other industries. I myself have picked cotton at 35 cents a hundred pounds when lint cotton was 8 cents a pound. Texas last year paid $3 a hundred pounds, and the average cost of harvesting the crop over the belt was above $2 a hundred. In this ratio a fair price for the crop of 1919 is well above 50 cents a pound. But even the high prices paid for harvesting the crop in 1919 failed to attract laborers to the cotton fields and much of the crop was wasted. Clearly, then, the remedy is to increase the price of cotton to the producer, so that he may secure an adequate, dependable supply of labor. Cotton growing in 1920 will be even more expensive to the producer.

THE TENANT FARMER.

The records show that 2,000,000 families in the South are engaged in growing cotton. The average production per family in 1919 was 5½ bales. The average in each family is a fraction over 5 persons. Sixty-two per cent are tenants, paying one-fourth rent to the landowner. This means that each tenant family has 4⅛ bales of cotton to support 5 persons during the year, an average of 3 of whom work in the cotton fields. The income is as follows:

4⅛ bales	$643.50
2.07 tons seed	186.30
Total annual gross income for entire family	829.80

No argument is needed to show this means, under present living prices—shoes, for example—a meager existence. Who among you would, even if you could, depress the price of cotton received by the producer under conditions such as these? Will it not be better for the country if the laborer is encouraged by sympathetic effort to increase his output per acre that he may be stimulated to a larger degree of efficiency?

THE SMALL LANDOWNER.

Gentlemen of the House, the situation of the small cotton farmer who owns and cultivates his own land is no less serious to the cotton industry. He is becoming forward looking, and he is standing up fighting with the spirit of a thoroughbred. He is rightly placing a new value on his own and his wife's labor and his invested capital. He demands right living conditions for his family and proper advantages for his children. If he fails to get a fair profit from his cotton, he will grow something else. The price of cotton is no longer determined by the necessity of the producer. It is now the necessity of the consumer.

RECORDS OF COST.

In 1919 the United States Department of Agriculture made a thorough study of the cost of producing cotton in 1918 on 842 cotton farms in 4 Southern States. An analysis of this report reveals that taking the average yield and the average cost per pound of the 842 farms reported on and applying it to 160 pounds, which was the average yield over the belt in 1918, it figures the cost of growing cotton for that year was 35½ cents a pound. The average selling price for the crop of 1918 was 28¾ cents a pound. With the advanced cost of production since 1918, it is clear that the crop of 1919 should sell well above 50 cents, and the cost of growing cotton is still advancing.

An exhaustive study of the average cost of producing the 1919 crop in Texas was made through a committee of cotton specialists by the department of agriculture of that State. The investigation covered the entire State. The average cost of production for the whole State was shown, by an itemized statement, to be 44 cents. The average selling price of cotton by the producer in the belt for 1919 is 31.2 cents. So, the average crop in Texas was produced at an average loss of 12.8 cents a pound.

AVERAGE TENANT COTTON FARM OF 20 ACRES.

To be exact, I give an accurate detailed statement, dated July 20, 1919, from Mr. W. W. Morrison, of New Orleans, one of the highest authorities in the world on the cost of cotton production:

It is perhaps well to say that the writer has had many years of practical experience in growing cotton, and that the items in the estimate below are generally concurred in by all of those with whom he has discussed the matter who have had a like experience. The figures below are based upon a 20-acre cotton farm. It will take all the time of one laborer and one plow animal to do the plowing required in cultivating such a farm and the outside work necessary to its general upkeep and such recreation, it should be emphasized, as every American citizen is entitled to. While more can be cultivated in some parts of Texas and Oklahoma, less can be cultivated in a good part of the belt east of the Mississippi River. Twenty acres seem, therefore, a fair average. The estimate is based upon 160 pounds of lint per acre:

Estimate cost cotton crop 1919.

Rent 20 acres land, $7.50 per acre	$150.00
Rent one plow animal	65.00
Feed one plow animal	279.00
Ginning 9,600 pounds seed cotton, 30 cents per hundred	28.80
Transportation farm products and supplies	30.00
Deterioration of farm implements	20.00
Labor one man, one year, $75 per month	900.00
Extra labor hoeing over crop three times, 75 days, $2.50 a day	187.50
Picking 9,600 pounds seed cotton, $1.50 per hundred	144.00
Gross expense	1,804.30
Less 3⅛ tons seed at $90 per ton	288.00
	1,516.30

Twenty acres at 160 pounds, 3,200 pounds lint, net expense $1,516.30; cost 47⅜ cents.

The current prices on which this statement is based can be too easily ascertained to make any discussion of the items in detail necessary. It may, however, facilitate investigation to state that the scientific feed for one plow animal for one year is 53 bushels of corn, 53 bushels of oats, and 3 tons of hay. This cost the consumer—corn, $2 per bushel; oats, $1 per bushel; hay, $60 per ton for No. 1 timothy. The estimate is based on country hay at $40 per ton. Labor is also based on a wage of $75 per month, or $2.50 per day. Much evidence in the hands of the writer indicates that it may average $3 per day for the year. The evidence also indicates that picking may average $2 instead of $1.50 for the season. No charge for fertilizer is included, as its reduced use during the last four years makes it an unimportant factor in the general average cost.

Retail merchants' books and local market quotations approximate, with much more accuracy than any other records, the price the growers of cotton have to pay. These records show that from 1913 to May, 1919, the price of these commodities advanced 273 per cent—labor during this time advanced 240 per cent, most of it during the last 20 months.

As labor makes up, according to the best authorities, about 50 per cent of the cost, these figures show an increase in the cost of growing cotton during this period of 256 per cent, or 34.56 cents per pound. In other words, cotton to-day would have to sell at 48.06 cents per pound to bear the same relation to the expense involved in its production that it bore in 1913, when the average price was 13½ cents.

MEXICAN PINK BOLLWORM.

Gentlemen, the appearance in Louisiana and Texas of the Mexican pink bollworm, unless crushed in its incipiency, threatens disaster. It means that unless drastic measures are immediately adopted the world's supply of cotton may be in peril. The expense of immediate action to eradicate the pest, the burden of this calamity, let me pause to say, should not be borne alone by the cotton producers. It should be borne by the Federal and State treasuries. When the cotton farmer fails, his farm laborer, his preacher, his school-teacher, his doctor, his dentist, his lawyer, his banker, his merchant, and his commission merchant alike suffer, as do the stock raiser, the wheat grower, the wheat dealer, and the cotton consumer in other sections of the country. The question is not sectional. It is national in its serious import and should be handled vigorously—and handled now—as such. The need is constant, close, and cordial cooperation between the Federal and the State authorities. Investigation, direction, and control should be financed by the Federal Government, while reparation or compensation to individual cotton growers for crops prevented or destroyed is of necessity a State matter. With the boll weevil working disaster in wet weather and the pink bollworm working ruin in dry weather, the cost of growing cotton will of necessity be vastly increased within the next year or two.

OTHER FARM PRODUCTS.

The following comparisons of average yearly prices of certain important farm products is shown by the records of the Bureau of Labor Statistics:

	1913	1919	Per cent of increase.
Cotton, New Orleans	$0.127	$0.319	151
Flaxseed	1.349	4.533	236
Corn, No. 2	.625	1.597	155
Corn, No. 3	.616	1.580	157
Winter wheat, Kansas City	.877	2.418	176
Spring wheat, Minneapolis	.874	2.566	194
Calfskins	.189	.685	263
Pacific coast hops	.172	.555	223
Wool (fine fleece, scoured basis)	.589	1.728	180

Of the nine commodities listed above, cotton showed a smaller increase from 1913 to 1919 than any other commodity.

ARTICLES THE COTTON FARMER HAS TO BUY.

The increase in the price of articles the farmer has to buy is vastly greater than the increase in the price of cotton. The War Industries Board price list No. 48, issued in 1919, shows the increase in the cost of certain fertilizer materials from 1914 to 1918:

		1914.	1918.
Acid phosphate (16 per cent phosphoric acid)	ton	$7.20	$17.75
Slaughterhouse tankage	do	26.27	57.50
Muriate potash	do	39.24	302.50
Kainit	do	8.43	40.00

Potash advanced 670 per cent during the war period. If the proposed Republican protective tariff on potash is enacted into law the price of the most commonly used fertilizer will be wholly prohibitive to the cotton farmer, thus further reducing the yield per acre and greatly advancing the cost of production.

The Boot and Shoe Recorder, in its issue of January 24, 1920, shows that since 1913 shoe leather and shoes have advanced in price as follows: Glazed kid, 850 per cent; calfskin, 600 per cent; calf leather, 450 per cent; shoes (men's and women's), 275 per cent.

STARTLING PROFITS IN OTHER INDUSTRIES.

The press carried the following news item:

BOSTON, March 24.

A stock dividend of 100 per cent to shareholders of the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co. was recommended to-day by the trustees.

The Pittsburgh Tin Plate and Steel Corporation said, in a letter of March 22:

Every operating tin-plate and sheet-steel mill has made enormous fortunes for their stockholders, many of the common stocks selling at 1,500 per cent premium. A steel company organized by the head of this corporation earned 77 per cent in one year, and the holders of original common stock made a profit of over 1,000 per cent.

INCREASING WORLD COTTON SHORTAGE.

Gentlemen, the seriousness of these conditions becomes evident when it is recalled that the cotton crop of 1919 was only 11,030,000 bales, while all dependable statistics and estimates show the world, needy and half-clothed, calls upon the South to produce over 15,000,000 bales in 1920. Under present conditions, how can there be big crops unless at higher price?

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, how can the additional 4,000,000 bales be produced, with labor only 60 per cent efficient and with a 25 per cent shortage, unless the price paid the producer is advanced sufficiently to attract an adequate, dependable, and efficient labor supply for intensive cultivation? Let critics of the cotton producer in and out of Congress supply the remedy, or else yield without quibble to the present logical economic situation which demands a fair price to the grower of raw cotton so urgently needed to clothe a naked European world, which is not less urgent than to feed a starving world.

Since the real problem of the cotton farmer is to increase, not the acreage but the yield per acre, the situation becomes even more difficult of solution when it is recalled that during 1910–1914, the five-year period immediately preceding the war, the South produced 73,518,000 bales, while during 1914–1919, the period of the war, the total production was 61,094,000 bales. During the first period the total acreage was 176,652,000, while during the war period the acreage was 168,759,000. This means the reduction in acreage was 4½ per cent, while the yield per acre fell off 17 per cent. The cotton farmer no longer gets an average yield per acre of 250 pounds of lint; he gets an average of only 158.2 pounds. The average yield in 1919 in Louisiana, on account of the ravages of the boll weevil and excessive rains, was only 93 pounds. This means necessarily an average one-third increase of labor and equipment to cultivate and harvest the necessary acreage and a much higher cost of production in 1920.

THE COTTON FARMER REFUSES TO BE STAMPEDED.

The spinners of New England and of Europe periodically seek to frighten the southern cotton farmer into accepting ruinous prices for his product. The motive behind the propaganda is apparent. One moment the southern cotton farmer is viciously attacked for holding his cotton. Then the press announces that shiploads of cotton, on account of foreign exchange conditions, are being rejected by England and returned to America. Then it is heralded that England has raised $75,000,000 to stimulate cotton production among her colonies. For 100 years this propaganda has from time to time gone out from spinners, and especially from England, but the southern cotton farmer now refuses to be stampeded. He knows the world must have cotton and that the South is fully able to supply the world, if only prices guarantee a fair profit to the producer. This one thing—a fair profit—in the future he will certainly demand and receive. He knows, on account of soil, climate, and industrial conditions elsewhere, that other countries can not compete with him. He knows that in the South there are over 50,000,000 acres of unreclaimed cotton lands, the finest in all the world, capable of producing 50,000,000 bales annually, sufficient to supply the world for generations to come. He knows that these lands, in easy reach of storage and transportation facilities, can, with modern machinery, be readily reclaimed. He knows that for 100 years the South has been developing a vast industrial organization of skilled cotton growers, banks, storage, and transportation facilities which make the threat of competition from Europe a delusion. No such cotton-growing organization is found or can be created within a generation anywhere else in the world. Why should he not be undisturbed and unafraid?

PROFITS.

The southern cotton farmer gets a smaller share of profits from his product than does the farmer in any other country in the world. He is willing for others to make profits from his cotton, but he has decided to demand his fair share.

The records of the Department of Agriculture (Department Circular 56, dated August, 1919) show that the cotton mills of the State of North Carolina consume about as much cotton as that State produces, about 800,000 bales. The records show that the mills of that State paid an average of $11.60 per bale more than the average price received by the farmer on the same date for cotton of the same grade and staple. After deducting $2.50 a bale for freight and drayage, the farmers of North Carolina received $7,280,000 less than the mills paid for their cotton. The farmers will find a way to share these millions. Why should they not?

Again, the records show that the average price of cotton received by the individual producer in the United States in 1919 was about 4 cents a pound, or $20 a bale less than the cotton mills paid for the same grade and staple. This means that the mills paid, including storage, freight, and drayage, $220,600,000 more for the crop than the farmers received for it. On this basis, the farmers of Louisiana sold their crop of 300,000 bales for $6,000,000 less than the mills paid for it. Do you wonder that the cotton growers are becoming alive to the situation to demand that these profits be reflected back proportionately to the farmer? [Applause.]

When the cotton farmers realize fully that the price is below the cost of production, they will hold their cotton as much as possible off the market until a living price is offered. What else can they do? What else would you have them do? Heretofore they have been financially unable to do this; to-day with their improved banking facilities they are less dependent.

PROFITEERING ON THE FARMERS' COTTON.

Gentlemen, excessive profits in the trade have barely begun to appear when the cotton reaches the spinner. Hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on February 28 revealed (1) that during the past six months cotton yarns at the mills have advanced in price more than 100 per cent, while raw cotton and labor at the mills advanced only 15 per cent; (2) cotton yarns are selling at $4 a pound, while the spinners pay 40 cents a pound for cotton; (3) New England spinning mills are making profits ranging from 250 to 600 per cent. A proper step was taken when by House resolution, April 5, the Federal Trade Commission is directed to investigate the increased price of cotton yarn from 1914 to 1919, inclusive. The spinners of England, there is ample evidence to show, have accumulated fabulous fortunes in the past 12 months profiteering on American cotton.

No equitable adjustment of world conditions is possible, nor can this country ever return to normal trade relations, unless the price of cotton paid the producer is adjusted properly to meet present conditions.

The cotton farmer sells his cotton at the lowest price that cotton brings; he then has to buy cotton goods at the highest price that goods bring. He goes to a dry-goods store and buys 6 yards of gingham, at 75 cents a yard. It costs him $4.50. He then notes that he sold the cotton in the gingham for exactly 25½ cents, while he pays $4.50 for the same cotton when it comes back to him in cloth. Should he not share this advance of 1,700 per cent? He then buys a 25-cent handkerchief, and finds he had sold the cotton in it for 1½ cents, which is an advance of over 1,500 per cent. When he takes his cotton to market he usually does not know its grade or its value. He accepts what is offered him. Then he has no part in naming the price of the goods he has to buy. The farmer can improve these conditions both for himself and his merchant, and he will.

PUBLICITY.

These are abnormal times and the inequalities in profits are said to be caused by the high cost of living, but these conditions will be adjusted. The greatest need now is pitiless publicity. The Bureau of Markets of the Department of Agriculture has done some good work in this line and is planning to do better work. The statistical information heretofore sent out from the Department of Agriculture by an expert is so technical that it takes three experts to interpret and translate the statistics into intelligible English. [Laughter.] The Bureau of Markets, charged with that duty, should collect and send out each day in simple, readable, intelligible form definite information showing what the farmers in each section of the country are receiving for their products and what the consumers in definite towns and cities of each section are paying that day for the same commodities. These figures should be published in the newspapers and sent by telegram to farmers' organizations, women's clubs, labor organizations, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and so forth, throughout the country. These organizations will gladly distribute the information by telephone to the individuals. The people have a right to know not only what the prices are but where the best daily markets are. [Applause.] If the information is properly distributed, using a standard basis in giving quotations, the people themselves will settle the question of profiteering. This principle holds good in the cotton industry. Widespread accurate information as to prices, grades, and classes of cotton and cotton fabrics is imperative if the cotton grower is to be successful.

MONEY VALUE OF TEACHING COTTON CLASSING.

Gentlemen of the House, the first suggested step in the movement to disseminate accurate information on cotton is further to coordinate the Federal Board for Vocational Education, the States Relations Service, and the Bureau of Markets with various State and county agencies in the cotton section.

During the summer months of this year the Bureau of Markets should furnish prepared standards—sample types of the various cotton grades or classes—and expert demonstrators in cotton classing to hold in each cotton State one or more schools of instruction of at least one week at such place or places, in connection with summer schools, as may be designated by the State authorities. The principals of the Smith-Hughes agricultural schools and the county agents should be required by the State and Federal authorities to attend. The principals and teachers of other agricultural schools should be requested to attend. Farmers and pupils should also be invited to attend.

In this way a beginning can be made and the foundation laid for the teaching of this important subject in the Smith-Hughes schools, where the pupils of these schools and the farmers may learn inexpensively properly to class their own cotton and know in advance the grade and market value of their cotton.

The Department of Agriculture will furnish the standard samples at cost to the Government. The State authorities should forthwith make provision for the regular teaching of cotton classing in the agricultural and mechanical colleges, and in the Smith-Hughes agricultural schools in the cotton section. A course of instruction covering a period of six weeks will enable a high-school pupil to become a successful cotton classer. The equipment for such course of instruction consists merely of standard samples and other raw cotton for comparison. The value of this instruction at this time to the cotton growers of the present and the future can not be estimated.

The Bureau of Markets has succeeded in arousing such interest in parts of the State of Texas that the farmers, upon their own initiative, have begun in a limited way the study of classing their cotton. The Department of Agriculture estimates that these Texas farmers have already profited $1,000,000 by this study; one farmer having this information increased the selling price of his crop $30 a bale.

It is clear that each farmer, if he is to follow business usage and hold his own as a business man, should know the various standard classes and the value and quality of his cotton before he offers it for sale. Having this information, he will strive to produce such grades as will be most remunerative. He will grow interested in improving his cotton seed. Why should he select his seed unless he knows the different classes of cotton? He will more carefully handle his cotton and see to it that it is properly ginned and baled to avoid the usually large output of low grades. In this way he will rapidly raise the standard and value of his product. A great opportunity for real and definite service for which they were created is now presented to the Smith-Hughes agricultural schools. This call to duty is unmistakably clear. The States through these schools should promptly respond. The Vocational Board and the Department of Agriculture, through the Bureau of Markets and the States Relations Service, have pledged their hearty cooperation when the State authorities take the initiative.

The proposed plan for teaching the classes of cotton should be adopted in the grain States. Cotton and grain are the only agricultural products that have been standardized by the Government.

COTTON FARMER NOT A STRIKER.

Gentlemen, the cotton farmer's vocation differs from other callings. He has few vacations. He can not go on a strike for a week or a month and resume work, losing only the wages for the idle period. His is a yearly business. He must plow in season, or there is no planting. He must plant in season, or he has no harvest. He must harvest in season, or he has nothing to sell. He must sell at the proper time, in the right way, at a fair profit, or he has no returns for his labor. He runs the risk of drouth, flood, and pestilence. No one guarantees him either price or profit.

A FAIR CHANCE.

He can not and he does not desire to restrict trade or corner the market to form an unreasonable monopoly. There is no reason, justice, or defense for proposed legislative restrictions on his plan of cooperative buying or collective bargaining. His thrift and enterprise thus to improve his market should certainly be encouraged. All he demands—a wholly righteous demand—is a fair return from the labor of his hands, a fair chance to earn an honorable living for himself and his family. This means that he properly demands that the price of cotton be high enough to enable him through industry and economy, with the proper market facilities, to live comfortably, not in a shack, but in a home with modern conveniences, with enough money to support his church, educate his children by properly paid trained teachers, purchase wholesome literature for his family, enjoy the use of telephones, good roads, and proper mail facilities.

He rightly demands enough income to send his children, now in the cotton field, into the schoolhouse and the women out of the cotton field back to the home. He has a right to demand a fair remuneration for his labor, a reasonable interest on his invested capital with a chance to improve his farm equipment, live stock, and soil, and to live as comfortably as the man in any other industry. The cotton growers are getting together to stay together, and they will not always have to call upon the "other fellow" to name the grade and price of cotton.

The American Cotton Association promises to become a potent influence for good in the cotton industry throughout. In rightly defending the cotton growers' economic life its provisions for properly marketing the cotton crops at prices fair to the producer or hold them off the market until world needs force an adjustment will protect the spinner against himself and guarantee to him the necessary output from the cotton fields for a dependable supply of cotton for his mills. If the spinners were unrestrained in their avaricious desire for cheap cotton, they would unwittingly destroy themselves by so depressing the price and decreasing production that their own mills would be forced to close. [Applause.]

A NEW DAY.

For 50 years, often without his knowing it, the cotton farmer received less than one-half the cost of producing cotton. He was a slave, with his wife and children toiling under the grinding heel of poverty and despair. He had a hopeless task, resulting in crushing his spirit, deadening his vitality, and destroying his initiative to construct for himself and his home. But, thank God, a new day dawns! The cotton farmer rising out of his 50 years in the wilderness has a new vision, a new perspective. He will force a new adjustment. He sees the profits made by others of 300 to 1,000 per cent on his product. He sees the farm lands of the North and West valued from $300 to $500 an acre and yet yielding enormous annual profits with boundless prosperity everywhere in the grain regions.

The cotton farmer rejoices to see his brother farmer in other sections of our great country prosperous and happy, but he himself refuses longer humbly to be driven by the lash of poverty thrust upon him by an unequal distribution of profits from his cotton when his own blessed South is the most abundantly favored land in climate and resources in all the world.

If he is not permitted to grow cotton at a profit the world problem of the future will not be how to get cheap cotton, but the question with the cotton mills and the consumer will be how to get cotton at any price. The cotton-consuming world can not and will not permit this to be. The sooner the purpose of the cotton farmer is known throughout the world the better will it be for all concerned and the easier will the adjustment be. In his decision to demand simple justice in the future the cotton farmer is loyally supported by men in all other activities in the cotton section. The banker and the merchant are his faithful supporters and friends.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, men of the South understand and fully appreciate the emergency of this hour; but let the cotton spinners of New England and of Europe, critics, oppressors, and profiteers everywhere, in the interest of their own business and for the good of humanity, pause to recognize that in the South the awakening is at hand. The mission of our great country is, with calmness and courage, to stand for individual and national liberty. No section leads the South in her spirit of patriotism and Americanism, but she claims the right to enjoy the liberties for which she gave her sons, the liberties she labors to give others. [Great applause.]

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, early this afternoon I called the attention of the House to the present status of the legislation intended to bring about the enactment of a law to establish a national budget system in this country. I am sorry that the distinguished leader of the majority is not on the floor at this time, because I asked him a question or two as to why practically no action has been taken on this bill during the past eight months, and he protested quite earnestly that the Senate budget committee had just reported the House bill out to the Senate in some form. I had often inquired about the bill ever since we passed it last October, and I had not noticed in the RECORD any report of that committee acting, so after having the colloquy with the gentleman from Wyoming, I called over the phone the clerk of that Senate committee and was informed that they had not made any report on the bill, but that the committee was expecting to take up the matter next week some time and report out a bill. Mr. Chairman, my thought about the matter is this: Of course, I can not with legislative propriety criticize a coordinate branch of our Government, no matter how negligent it may be, but the party in power is responsible and is subject to just criticism for not passing this bill several months ago. And now, when there is talk of Congress adjourning in June, I feel, as a member of the House budget committee, that this matter ought not to sleep any longer. The House has performed its full duty, but unless some very vigorous action is taken very soon this bill will not be enacted before next February, if it ever is.

If there ever was a time in the history of our Government when we needed a budget system, when we needed thorough business economy and efficient methods in our financial affairs, it is right at the present time. In view of our present financial conditions, the unparalleled conditions left by the war, every thoughtful person who knows anything about these conditions and the fiscal policy of our Government must have a very deep-seated realization of the importance of this measure, and I feel that with the way the matter has been allowed to drag along during the past eight months the chances are there will not be anything accomplished this year. I notice in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 16, 1919, pages 619 to 621, a magazine article by a distinguished Member of another body, who is chairman, I may say, of a budget committee in that other body, in which article the first sentence is, "The business men of the country are crying out for a national budget."

If that is so, why does not he do something to give it to them? He then goes on to criticize very severely the bill passed by this House, and says that it is not a budget system, and that it postpones the day when a true budget system may be obtained. His closing sentence is, "We have the information, the experience, and the occasion for applying drastic remedies, as did Hamilton. Let us do nothing less." To be consistent he ought to have omitted the last word. In another sentence he asks, "What have we done?" Echo answers, "Nothing." It seems to me that with the many distinguished Republican gentlemen hippodroming around over the country making loud and eloquent speeches, clamoring for a budget system, promising a budget to the people of America if they are elected next fall, that it is about time something was done by this Congress. What is the sense of waiting until a year or so from now or until after election next fall to enact a budget system? You Republican gentlemen have a good working majority right here in both the Senate and House. There is no opposition by the Democrats. We are for it. You have a splendid bill to operate on that passed practically unanimously through this House on October 21, 1919, seven months ago, and which now is sleeping peacefully in a pigeonhole and has been for all these seven months. That is not the way to keep faith with the American people. Both of our party platforms promised this legislation. The business interests of the entire country demand it. The financial welfare of our Government demands it. Every Member of this Congress knows, or ought to know, that this measure is imperative at the earliest possible moment. I believe that the Republican membership of this House owe it to themselves and to the people of the country to bring in the necessary rule and put that House bill on one of these appropriation bills. I think it ought to be put on to this one under consideration at this time. At least it ought to be done before all these bills are passed, and nearly all of them have been passed already, and another body, if necessary, should be forced to override any personal vanity or pride of individual opinion, if there is any, and accept the budget system in that way. The party should not allow itself to be held responsible for whatever is causing this delay.

I feel that I ought to correct the impression that the bill has been reported out by the Senate committee, because that is evidently a mistake in information on the part of the majority leader. In my reference to Gov. Lowden and Gen. Wood, who nearly every day in their public speeches and public statements are advocating a budget system—I do not mean to criticize them, because I have a very high regard for both of them; I know them both. But they have no copyright on the budget system. Neither has anybody in the Senate. It is not a partisan measure, and they have no priority of appropriation on its advocacy. The Democrats supported it as actively and earnestly as the Republicans did. The report of our Budget Committee was unanimous. And acting in good faith, I feel the obligation to take the lead in this matter devolves upon the other side of the House, and they ought to take whatever steps are necessary to promptly adopt this system that has long ago been adopted by practically every civilized nation in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON rose.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins will he yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I could not resist.

Mr. WALSH. I take it, in view of the fact that the gentleman is going to talk for 15 minutes, that he has attended to his marketing to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Although this Saturday evening is marketing day, and it is now late, and almost marketing time, I can not resist making a few remarks on a vital subject before we adjourn.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLANTON. Not yet; I will directly. I must first get something before my friends present.

Mr. Chairman, if there could be anything more farcical than the proceedings we had yesterday and the day before it is the proceeding which has been going on here several hours this afternoon. We are in general debate on a great supply measure of this Government, the fortifications appropriation bill, and there are only nine Republican Members now on the floor, representing the great majority party of this House.

Mr. REBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. REBER. The gentleman said there are nine Republicans. Why does he slight the Democrats?

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to get to them. If it was not for our loyal, patriotic Democratic colleagues, who stay here with our distinguished leader [Mr. CLARK] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and others of us who stay here and keep the Government business going, God only knows what would become of the business of this Government. Are you gentlemen not ashamed of yourselves, pretending to be in charge of the Nation's business and keeping such a measly handful of Republican Representatives of the people here to pass legislation? This bill is supposed to be debated for three hours. Almost that time has been consumed, and with no audience. Simply because estimates have been cut down by the committee is no reason why there should not be any interest in the bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] referred to the fact that I did not ask that we adjourn earlier to-day to give our employees a chance to go to market. I did not do that because we had to finish this bill this afternoon so that we can pass to the great Graham constructive measure that is to come in on Monday, which after we have debated and passed upon it will be just as meaningless to the country as was the result of the two days' waste of time which occurred yesterday and the day before. How long is this going to keep up? Four hundred and thirty-five Congressmen drawing big salaries from this Government, and you can not keep a handful here to attend to the Government's business. Do not you Republicans know that the people are not going to stand for it? Do not you Republicans know that the people are going to bring you to account in November? You are going to hear from this on the hustings, and you are going to have to answer.

What are you going to answer? Can you not control your Members? Can not your majority leader and your good, energetic Republican whip, with whom I have controversies sometimes, and yet whom I love, keep them in line and make them attend to their business?

If you can not, you might as well give up. Why, there is another party here ready to take charge of the business of the Government and run it on a business basis. We Democrats are willing to again take charge.

Mr. EDMONDS. It did not use to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. If you would only let us do it. The proposed budget system has been mentioned. But what good is a budget system going to do? It will be good as far it goes, but something else is necessary. We are going to have one. We have already passed a budget measure. It is a splendid measure. The people are to be congratulated that we are going to have one as a result of the magnificent effort and work done by such men as Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Sherley, whose presence we need now. But that is not going to save the Government money of itself. Do you know what it is going to take? It is going to take hard work by Members of Congress and personal investigation of these various departments and their estimates by Members of Congress. We do too little work in that respect. We take for granted too much. I do lots of investigating. You have got to know more about your Nation's business if you keep these estimates down properly. I commend this distinguished committee, and I think it needs commendation more than any committee of this House, for it has cut down the estimates over $98,000,000 on this bill. They deserve commendation; but that is no reason why we should just accept their act here and not give this bill our careful investigation in general debate on this floor. I wish I had time. I would call attention to several items in this bill that need further cutting and could be cut without doing harm to the fortifications of this country, but I must discuss another subject. I congratulate our great Secretary of Agriculture. Do you know he has helped some of us bring about one of the greatest little reforms that I know of that have occurred in a long time? He has helped us to get rid of this measly, nasty, little old insignificant congressional seed distribution graft that has been going on in this country for so long.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Of course the conference report on that bill has not been presented.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but the Republican conferees do not dare to overturn that action. Let me read you the letter from the Secretary of Agriculture on that point. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, March 23, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I think you will be interested in the inclosed copy of a letter which I recently wrote to Senator GRONNA, chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, recommending that the appropriation for the "congressional seed distribution" be eliminated from the bill. It seems to me that this appropriation can well be discontinued in the interest of economy. Certainly the money now devoted to it could be much more advantageously utilized in the prosecution of urgent and important work on problems of crop production. I sincerely hope that the Senate will confirm the action of the Senate committee in striking the item from the bill and that it will be agreed to by the conferees.

I am also taking the liberty of sending you a copy of my letter of March 1 to Senator SMOOT, chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing. May I not call your attention especially to the suggestion that the present edition of the Yearbook, which, as you know, is an annual publication, might well be reduced and that the farmers' bulletins, four-fifths of which are now allotted to Members of Congress, should be handled entirely by the Department of Agriculture? As you perhaps know, only 30,000 copies of the Yearbook are allotted to the department, the remaining 470,000 copies being distributed through Members of Congress. If only a few thousand copies were issued, as suggested in my letter, a considerable saving could be effected. So far as the farmers' bulletins are concerned, I am convinced that much better results would be secured if the matter of their distribution were placed entirely under the control of the department. Under the present arrangement, when four-fifths of the bulletins are available to Members of Congress, it is possible for the department to comply with only a very small portion of the demand for them. I do not know what action the Joint Committee on Printing will take with reference to these matters, but I sincerely hope that the recommendations I have made will receive favorable consideration. Our appropriation for printing is carried in the sundry civil bill, which has not yet been reported out by the House Committee on Appropriations.

Very truly, yours,
E. T. MEREDITH,
Secretary.

Does the gentleman from Massachusetts mean to insinuate that after the Secretary of Agriculture had agreed with us and requested the Senate to get rid of this little old measly and pernicious graft that the Republican conferees of this House, who have control of this legislation in its finality, are going to put that pernicious measure back into the bill? I do not believe it. I dare them to do it. The majority leader is not going to let it be done. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is not going to let it be done. For it saves $300,000 annually for the people.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Do not take up all my time.

Mr. MONDELL. Personally I am inclined to think that the seed-distribution appropriation ought to go out, but I notice the Secretary of Agriculture——

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad to hear that, because the gentleman was not in favor of keeping the 13 surveyors general out of the bill and had them put back——

Mr. MONDELL. The Secretary of Agriculture, while he is in favor of not giving Congressmen any seed to send out, asks for a few million dollars to employ useless and unnecessary folks to run around over the country bothering the farmers when they ought to be busy gathering their crops. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BLANTON. I do not commend the Secretary for that. I hope this will not be taken out of my time. I can not be discourteous to my good friend, the distinguished and magnificent majority leader, who, when occasion arises, advises the use of the snickersnee, but when the Appropriations Committee uses the snickersnee and cuts 13 surveyors general out of a bill he comes back on the floor of the House with his persuasive qualities and induces his Republican colleagues to put that $181,000 and the 13 surveyors general and their 13 corps back into that bill, because he does not want Wyoming, his own State, to lose the expenditure of that appropriation of public money; this same distinguished gentleman from Wyoming, our majority leader, who, when the wintertime was on, after we had already appropriated thousands of dollars to feed his elk out in Wyoming, came here on the floor of the House and forced his colleagues to give $35,000 more to feed the elk out in his State of Wyoming, when human beings were starving to death for want of food.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I can not. I want to get to another matter. I am with the gentleman from Wyoming seriously on this question of economy. I prod him for economy; I am helping him to secure economy. He needs my help.

I want to call his attention to another subject upon which he can economize. Take the letter from the Chief of the Efficiency Bureau of this Government, Herbert D. Brown. What does he say? Let me again read you that letter, excerpts of which I put in the RECORD on March 5, 1920.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by putting this letter in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. The following is the letter:

UNITED STATES BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY,
Washington, D. C., March 3, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I have just received your letter of March 2, in which you make certain inquiries concerning personnel conditions in the executive departments in Washington. I will quote your questions and undertake to answer them in the order in which they appear in your letter:

"(1) Both Congressman MADDEN and myself estimate that there are now in Washington 40,000 idle, unnecessary clerks still on the pay roll, whose services could be dispensed with without crippling the service. Is this true or not?"

I do not know whether your figures are correct or not, because I have not had the opportunity to find out. I know that there are a great many unnecessary clerks in Washington (literally thousands), but whether the number of them is 20,000, 40,000, or some other figure, I can not say. I know that there are very many superfluous clerks in Washington, because investigations made by the Bureau of Efficiency in certain offices have disclosed that fact. Whether this condition is general throughout the departments I am not prepared to say without making a comprehensive survey of the whole service. With the limited force of investigators at my disposal, I am unable to make such a survey at the present time.

There is no doubt in my mind but that it would be possible for administrative supervisors to reduce the number of their clerical assistants very greatly: (1) Because the volume of work in the departments to which they are attached is considerably less than it was during the period of the war when many of these clerks entered the service, and (2) because, now that the war strain is over, time can be found in the departments for improvement of methods. Whether the resulting reduction in the force would amount to 40,000 workers, which would be approximately 40 per cent of the total number now engaged, I am not prepared to say.

It is only fair to the administrative officers to say that present conditions have grown out of unusual circumstances. The war emergency made it necessary to organize many new offices and to expand practically every existing governmental agency overnight. The times were abnormal and heads of departments and independent establishments were placed at the enormous disadvantage in handling organization problems. Ordinary principles of efficiency could not always be applied under these circumstances. The departments have, however, now passed the peak of the war load. It should, in my opinion, be possible at this time to institute a program of strict economy.

"(2) May we expect efficient service generally from our employees as long as they are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor?"

I believe that the affiliation of Government employees with labor organizations must, of necessity, result in a reduction of efficiency in the departments. I am of the opinion that such affiliation has an unfortunate effect on the morale of the service. The employee comes to feel that his success depends not so much on his individual effort as on the political strength of the organization to which he belongs.

"(3) Is there not fully as much reason for separating our Government employees from strike organizations as there was for separating the police and firemen from such organizations?"

Yes; quite as much reason, and even more. In the event of police strikes or strikes involving a fire department it will always be possible, because of the relatively small number of people involved, for residents of the community to assume the burdens laid down by the striking policemen or firemen, and while it is true that inexperienced persons would not be able to safeguard the public interests to the same extent as could regular policemen or firemen, yet the danger to the community could be kept within reasonable bounds and situations of this sort could be taken care of with a relatively small loss to the public. In the case of a strike of Government workers, which might involve not merely a few employees, but practically the entire force in the Government service, the damage to the public interest would be far greater. Such a strike would practically result in the suspension of all the functions of the Federal Government. It would affect not merely a few people, or a few thousand people, but, practically speaking, the entire population of the country.

"(4) I call your attention to the attack made upon you in the Federal Employee, the official magazine of the National Federation of Federal Employees, for February 28, 1920, page 3 thereof, suggesting your demise, by reason of your late activities for efficiency. Is this veiled threat of the official organ of Government employees going to stop your activities and cause you to 'lay down'?"

My answer to this inquiry is, "No." I shall continue to work for economy and efficiency in the Government service without regard to threats that may be made by any person or organization.

Very sincerely, yours,
HERBERT D. BROWN,
Chief Bureau of Efficiency.

The Federal Employee, the official mouthpiece for all organized Government employees, for February 28, 1920, devoted pages 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 to an unwarranted and vicious attack upon Chief Brown of this United States Bureau of Efficiency, because of his late efforts to bring about efficiency, and is trying to ruin him.

You will note he makes certain recommendations in that letter that I do not see how on God's earth our distinguished Republican leader of this House and the Republican steering committee can afford to ignore, with a deficit of $3,000,000,000 staring us in the face. You have just granted these employees a raise of $50,000,000. Why do you not back up Chief Brown in his efforts to secure some efficiency in their service? They have tried to get the Senate lately to legislate Chief Brown's position out of existence—to get rid of him.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. My recollection is that the affiliation of Federal employees with the labor organizations came about through the approval of our President.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is one matter upon which I do not agree with the President, and I am willing to say that with an election staring me in the face. I think the President of the United States is the biggest man in this Nation to-day, and you know it. And down deep in your heart you think it, too. It is his greatness that is keeping you fellows awake at night. As I said yesterday, it somnambulates every one of you Republicans. You can not sleep. It bothers you in the morning and at noontime, and in the evening, and late at night. You can not get rid of the greatness of that man. And yet I do not agree with all of his policies. I voted to pass the prohibition bill over his veto; I voted to pass the daylight-saving bill over his veto; I am against the proposed wet plank in the San Francisco platform, and I am against some of his other policies. Nevertheless, he is the greatest man we have in the United States to-day, and you Republicans realize it.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced this bill in the interest of an American marine insurance market. Marine insurance is an absolute necessity for the successful conduct of foreign trade. It is more than a fundamental agency of commerce, and its importance extends beyond the commercial function of protecting property and credit and of stabilizing banking, commerce, and shipping. Our leading commercial rival has used it for years as a competitive weapon in international trade. Marine insurance has served as a powerful weapon to comb out profits in international trade and to meet competitive situations. Possession of sufficient marine insurance facilities is also absolutely necessary to the United States for the proper safeguarding of commercial information, as was so well demonstrated by our recent experience with German insurance and reinsurance companies. Underwriters know the cargoes, consignors, consignees, carriers, trade routes, destinations, financial affiliations, and leading contract terms of our commercial transactions. By supinely letting foreign underwriters do our marine insurance we simply open our books and our trade secrets to our rivals to be used against our merchants and our merchant marine.

The recent investigation of marine insurance by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries shows that an independent American marine insurance business does not exist. American interests have lost their grip on this type of insurance. No other vital branch of American commerce has passed so extensively under foreign control. A mere handful of companies do two-thirds of the business, and nearly one-fifth of the American marine insurance companies are foreign owned or very closely allied by having directors or leading stockholders resident abroad.

Two-thirds of all the marine insurance written in the United States—hull and cargo insurance combined—is controlled by foreign underwriters, and of hull insurance more than three-fourths is thus controlled. American companies also placed one-half of all their reinsurance with alien underwriters, mostly because of necessity. Your committee was also convinced that foreign interests are making a determined effort right now to undermine American marine insurance, small though it be, with a view to reducing it to still smaller proportions. The great majority of American companies reported to the committee that they did not and could not emphasize hull insurance, a very large proportion of which is exported directly to the foreign market without appearing in any of the records on this side. They have frankly stated their handicaps, and among these excessive taxation, based on a wrong principle, easily ranks as first.

Such a state of affairs is not to the credit of this Nation. It is a peril so great that we should be aroused to immediate action. Strenuous rivalry in international trade is already upon us, and will soon be unsurpassed for keenness. The immediate future requires that our foreign-trade equipment be strengthened in its three great departments—shipping, banking, and insurance. As contained in the report of the Merchant Marine Committee:

> There can be no doubt, judging from the manner in which our competitors are now seeking to undermine this branch of underwriting, that marine insurance will be used, as probably never before, as a national commercial weapon for the acquisition and development of foreign markets. Failure to act now in strengthening our marine insurance facilities and placing them in an independent position, free from foreign control, can not be regarded otherwise than as the neglect of a duty and of an opportunity. The loss of the present rich opportunity will soon be bitterly regretted, but it will be too late to undo the mischief.

But the worst of the whole miserable affair is that the existing plight of American marine insurance is due to our own making and our own folly. Legislative obstacles upon obstacles, entirely unnecessary and exceedingly harmful, have been heaped upon the business. The investigation of your committee has made this clear and the facts and conclusions have been published in the committee's report.

Of the burdens now resting on marine insurance none are greater than the excessive and incredible taxation. No other essential and strategic business has suffered so cruelly from unwise and unmerciful taxation as the insurance business. A carefully prepared compilation for the committee absolutely proves this statement. The taxation, for example, imposed upon the marine insurance business of the 12 leading American companies, writing 61 per cent of the net marine premiums written by all American companies, amounted to 7.69 per cent of their net marine premium income during 1918. In other words, for every $100 of marine premiums received and retained by the companies the Federal and State Governments took nearly $8, and this before any allowance is made for loss payments and expenses. The total taxes and fees paid by these companies for a single year amounted to 39.5 per cent of their capital stock, 68.5 per cent of their dividends plus the total increase in surplus for the year, 180 per cent of the dividends paid to stockholders, and 11.4 per cent of their total capital and surplus. Stated in another way, these companies paid taxes in a single year amounting to over 11 per cent on their assets over and above liabilities, to nearly 40 per cent on their capital stock and nearly 69 per cent on their profits. Moreover, for every dollar of dividends paid to stockholders during the year the American taxgatherer took nearly $2. Again, when I state that the taxation amounted to nearly 69 per cent of the profits, it should not be forgotten that the income of these companies is derived very largely from their investments, as distinguished from underwriting profits. Leading underwriters testified before your committee that they are well satisfied, over a period of years, to make underwriting profits equal to 5 per cent of the gross premiums received. Judged from this standpoint, present taxation is equal to 100 per cent and more of the entire underwriting profit.

Such folly is not perpetrated by our leading commercial competitor, despite the fact that she is in much greater need of revenue than we are. She fosters the business, because she realizes the vital and strategic importance of marine insurance in its relation to the whole structure of foreign trade. British taxation on marine insurance is not only much smaller but is levied on net profits, thus recognizing the fact that a premium written may result in a loss, without, however, any consideration being shown under a gross premium tax, which is the principal method of insurance taxation in this country. As an illustration of England's more reasonable attitude, despite her heavier need for taxation, I might mention the fact that a hull insured for $100,000 at 5 per cent in the United States pays a tax on the premiums of approximately $200 against about $25 in England. We, on the contrary, forget the broader and more vital aspects of the situation, and our vision is limited to revenue, revenue, and more revenue. We act as though marine insurance is a public nuisance to be restricted by taxation in the interest of the public welfare.

The American shipowner and merchant must pay this unreasonable tax bill in the long run or seek his insurance in foreign markets where such burdens do not exist. This they have done to the great discomfiture of our own underwriters. Our underwriters do not object to paying taxes on their profits like any other business. They are paying their just income and profits taxes under our present Federal system of taxation. But it is beyond comprehension why insurance was singled out for an additional tax, over and above income and profits taxes, of 1 per cent on the gross premiums. This is equivalent to an extra income tax of between 15 and 20 per cent. If the marine insurance business were local in character, the tax could be shifted easily to the consumer, who must buy the service in that local market. But marine insurance, among all the forms of insurance, is peculiar in that it is not local, but national and international in character. It is easily cabled abroad, and over half of all our hull insurance is thus exported to the foreign market. The Federal tax of 1 per cent on gross premiums can not be shifted. It remains as a handicap to our companies, in addition to their numerous other handicaps, in their competition with English underwriters. These underwriters have enough advantage as it is, and by retaining this tax we simply give them an additional advantage. It increases the differential against our companies and to that extent enables foreign underwriters to underquote our own and obtain the business. I am therefore earnestly urging the repeal of this tax in so far as it pertains to marine insurance. The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries has unanimously recommended the repeal. Such repeal will be in direct line with our effort to also reduce excessive State taxes on the marine insurance business. No one opposes fair taxation. But what we have before us is not fair, but iniquitous. The loss in revenue resulting from the passage of this bill will be a mere inconsequential item as compared with the direct and indirect benefits resulting from the establishment of a strong and independent national marine insurance institution as an integral part of our foreign trade equipment.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the majority may have been guilty of some mistakes, and the majority leader may have been at fault once in a while; but the majority have never made the mistake of undertaking to suppress the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. We have appropriated a lot of money to suppress the boll weevil down there, but we have never done anything to preclude the gentleman from Texas from speaking in extenso whenever he saw fit.

The minority leader from Texas sometimes attacks the President, but he is never able to get any following from the minority side. Whenever an appropriation bill is brought here and a motion is made to reduce an expenditure, the gentleman from Texas votes for the motion; but those he is supposed to lead vote in favor of increasing the appropriation, so that his leadership has never helped us any, but the combined effort of the minority on frequent occasions has had the effect of carrying appropriations when 90 per cent of the membership of the majority have voted in the other direction.

But I had no purpose to advert upon this subject; my thought was that if I were permitted to speak for awhile on this bill this afternoon I should speak in a more friendly vein in regard to the membership of the House. When I came to this Congress I was presented to my distinguished friend, the great veteran leader from the State of Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and he said, "GOODYKOONTZ"——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

Mr. SLEMP. I can give the gentleman only one minute.

Mr. EAGAN. I will yield to the gentleman one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. He said, "GOODYKOONTZ, you have come to the greatest school in the world." I was also presented to Mr. MANN, the other great leader from Illinois, and he said, "Mr. GOODYKOONTZ, this is the greatest legislative body in the world." And when I heard the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this bill explain and present to you the matters that arise upon that measure, I thought this: That whereas there are some great men in charge of the committees in this House, yet no man has spoken more clearly or shown a greater fund of information or has ordered his words with more precision or has provided more general information to those inquiring in regard to it than the chairman of the subcommittee, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP]. [Applause.] And then I thought of the fact that when he graduated at the Military Institute of Virginia he reached the highest grade that had ever been attained by any student in that distinguished school of the South. So that this body is made up of many men of many minds, Representatives who come from every section of the country.

I should like to go further, but I shall content myself with asking to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has eight minutes remaining. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, sometimes I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]; quite frequently I agree with his views. I even agree with him in the matter of attendance upon the House. I have long regretted that we did not have a more generous attendance on the ordinary proceedings of the House. But I want to calm his fears relative to any decadence in the House by telling him that the condition that he has witnessed since he has been here is about the condition that we have had for many years, including the last eight years, when his party had the leadership and the majority here.

I sometimes do not blame the gentlemen of the House because they do not always attend the general debates. They realize that there is to be no vote taken; they do not know for certain that they will be entertained by the gentleman from Texas; they may even fear that I am going to speak, and so they stay away. [Laughter.] But we do have a very excellent attendance generally in the House when the House is really doing business. And let us remember this: That neither this nor any other legislative body could properly carry on its business, consider its legislation, and do the work assigned it if there was always a majority in attendance during the legislative sessions. There is so much work to do in committee; there is so much that Members must do toward informing themselves with regard to legislation, in attending committee hearings, and meetings and discussions, that if we had a majority here on the floor all the time we would not have that close, careful, and thorough consideration of legislation that is absolutely essential. After all, the work on the floor is more or less the dress parade after the work is done. Of course, that does not apply to the speeches of my friend from Texas, which are always interesting and generally to the point. I am willing to admit that mine are not always so interesting.

I want to congratulate the Committee on Appropriations, the House of Representatives, and particularly the members of the subcommittee that considered this bill. It is something of an undertaking to persuade departmental officers that they can reduce their own estimates from one hundred and seventeen to forty-seven millions; and then it requires very careful consideration and very thorough and exhaustive work for a committee to take the estimates thus reduced and reduce them from forty-seven to seventeen millions. This committee has reduced the original estimates under this bill $98,959,808.88, and I have no doubt that the reductions have been made with understanding, with knowledge, with appreciation of the needs of the service, and without in any particular or at any point reducing the estimates below what is required for the necessary work of the service in the line of fortifications and defense. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP] is entitled to very great credit for his work. [Applause.] And his colleagues on the subcommittee are entitled to very great credit for their work. We have made some very heavy reductions in estimates during this Congress, but in no case so heavy a reduction has been made as in this bill. And the important thing to remember is that it has not been a reduction simply for the purpose of making a reduction. It has not been a thoughtless reduction. It has not been a reduction without regard to the needs of the service. It has been an intelligent reduction, made in view of the absolute necessity at this time of bringing our expenditures as a people within our income.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. MONDELL. In that time I want to refer to another matter.

The Public Ledger of the City of Brotherly Love this morning brings up the much discussed question of raising Army and Navy pay, and it says that the failure to increase Army and Navy pay is due mainly to the hostility of FRANK W. MONDELL, majority floor leader, and that a tacit understanding exists that nothing shall be done at the present session.

Now, whether or not the fact that we have not increased Army and Navy pay is in anywise due to my attitude in the matter be true or no, the remainder of that statement is without any basis or foundation whatever, at least so far as I know. I have never said, I have never thought, I have never believed that we should adjourn this session of Congress without giving some consideration to the general question of increases of pay in the Military and Naval Establishments. I think before we leave we must also give consideration to increases in the pay of some of those in the civil establishment. I do not know what the Congress will finally conclude to do, but I think those things must be considered. The trouble is that the House having passed an emergency bill relating to a few men in the Naval Establishment, certain gentlemen in the Naval and Military Establishments are insisting that the House shall allow its conferees to raise the pay of all the officers of the Army and the Navy in a sum amounting to about $75,000,000 per annum without the House having passed on the matter. The bill necessary to increase the pay of the petty officers of the Navy and of the Coast Guard could become a law any day if certain gentlemen would cease their insistence that before this absolutely essential legislation goes on the statute books the whole question of advances in pay in all branches of the Regular Military Establishment shall be considered. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SLEMP. Let us begin the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. McKEOWN. I will withdraw the point until one paragraph of the bill has been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, namely:

FORTIFICATIONS AND OTHER WORKS OF DEFENSE.

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.

For construction of gun and mortar batteries, $1,800,000.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum present.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SANFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13555) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

MONDAY, April 12, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we are Thy workmanship, created unto good works, called to the stewardship of a great service that has been committed unto us, a responsibility that we dare not meet except by the divine guidance and blessing. But as Thou hast smiled upon us as a people, led us by the hand unto a large place, so we trust Thee to lead us on to accomplish Thy divine purpose in us. Forgive our sins. Save us from fatal mistakes. Give us a due regard for the divine will. Help us to fulfill our mission. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

RAILROAD STRIKES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I wish to read for the information of the Senate a telegram which I have received from one of the cities in my State. It is difficult for a representative of a great State to contemplate with composure the present situation in regard to the strikes which threaten the starvation of an entire State. I do not know what can be done by Congress, but I want to raise my voice in behalf of some action which will make any conspiracy hereafter by any group of men, who through the power of combination threaten to starve and freeze the American people, unlawful and illegal. This is a telegram from the acting mayor of Hackensack, N. J.:

HACKENSACK, N. J., April 11, 1920.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
Senate Building, Washington D. C.:

At a mass meeting of the citizens of Tenafly, Bergen County, N. J., held to-day the following preambles and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas the present strike of switchmen, firemen, and others employed on the railroads has occurred without any formal statement of grievances; and

Whereas said strike is opposed by the responsible officers of the railroad labor unions; and

Whereas said strike savors strongly of syndicalism and direct action which completely violates the spirit of American institutions; and

Whereas said strike, in fact, represents the effort of a minority to impose its will by force on the majority against the spirit of our institutions and the laws of the land and as such constitutes an abuse of power that becomes intolerable tyranny; and

Whereas said strike disturbs the orderly processes of industry and commerce and thereby endangers the lives and liberty and the pursuit of happiness of all citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved by this mass meeting of the citizens of the Borough of Tenafly, State of New Jersey, and vicinity, held on Sunday afternoon April 11, 1920, That we appeal to the strikers to recognize the antisocial nature of the strike and return to work at once in the assurance that the public desires to see properly adjusted any just grievance; be it further

Resolved, That the wanton nature of this strike precludes the possibility of temporizing, and that we demand of the President and the Congress of the United States of America that immediate exercise of all of the power of the Government in behalf of the great law-abiding majority of the citizens of the country to cause a resumption of railroad traffic; and be it further

Resolved, That we demand similar action so far as lies in their power and jurisdiction of the governor and the Legislature of the State of New Jersey; and be it further

Resolved, That the acting mayor of the Borough of Tenafly be requested immediately to telegraph these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the United States Senators from the State of New Jersey, and to the Congressman from this district, and also to the governor of the State of New Jersey and to the State senator and assemblyman from this district.

J. D. P. KENNEDY, Acting Mayor.

Mr. President, at the present time this strike has almost reached the state of revolution. The Senate passed an antistrike provision in the railroad act which provided ample means for the settlement of difference and grievances by the railway labor men employed on the railroads. The Senate passed that measure believing that where men conspired to tie up a great country and starve and freeze the people it should be made illegal. The House of Representatives failed to pass that provision. I say the time has come in this country to find out whether we have a Government or not, and to pass laws which will make for the peace and happiness of the American people.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask permission to say a word in regard to the subject which the Senator from New Jersey just referred to.

I have just introduced a bill intended to provide a means by which the Government can perform the functions which devolve upon it under the duty of regulating interstate commerce, and I should like to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey and the Senate very briefly to the nature of the measure. I am going to ask that the Committee on Interstate Commerce give the matter very early consideration.

There was objection made to the so-called antistrike clause in the Cummins railroad bill which has been enacted into law because of the claim that it imposed involuntary servitude, it being argued by certain representatives of railroad employees that the purpose of it was to compel them to stay in service and to deny them the right of quitting their employment.

Of course that was not either the purpose or the effect of that provision, and it is my opinion that the attempt which has brought about the present paralysis, in some sections, of interstate commerce is not the assumption of the right of men who engaged in the operation of the agencies of interstate commerce to quit their employment but it is the exercise by those men of a right to persuade or coerce others to quit their employment. If Congress is to live up to the duties which devolve upon it under the power to regulate interstate commerce, which implies the duty to protect interstate commerce, it must have the authority, and it ought to exercise it, in my opinion, to penalize any effort, either by persuasion or by coercion on the part of any organization or any individual, whether it be a conspiracy or not, to obstruct the free movement of such commerce.

I thought it was the weakness of the clause referred to in the railroad bill that it only penalized a conspiracy. I think that such obstruction ought to be made a crime, whether it is effected through conspiracy or whether it is the act of individuals not in conspiracy, when with the intent of interfering with the operation of agencies of interstate commerce in the movement of commodities between States or commerce with foreign nations any individual or any organization interferes with the employment of any other person in the operation of those agencies.

I have provided in this bill, Mr. President, a penalty aimed at that, which I believe can be vindicated both as a matter of policy and as a matter of constitutional power on the part of Congress:

That whoever with intent to obstruct, delay, hinder, impede, or prevent the movement of commodities in commerce with foreign nations or among the several States shall by word of mouth or by the presentation, exhibition, or circulation of written or printed words, or otherwise, solicit, advise, induce, or persuade, or attempt to induce or persuade, any person or persons employed in any capacity in the production, care, maintenance, or operation of any means or agency of such commerce, to quit such employment shall be guilty of a felony and punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 2. Whoever, with intent to obstruct, delay, impede, hinder, or prevent the movement of commodities in commerce with foreign nations or among the several States shall by force or violence, or by threats or menace of any kind, prevent or seek to prevent any person from engaging in employment or from continuing in employment in any capacity in the production, care, maintenance, or operation of any means or agency of such commerce shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $15,000, or by imprisonment for 15 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 3. Whoever, with intent to obstruct, delay, hinder, impede, or prevent the movement of commodities in commerce with foreign nations or among the several States shall injure, disable, or destroy any car, bridge, track, ship, or any other means or agency of such commerce or shall with like intent solicit, advise, induce, or persuade others to do so, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of $10,000, or by imprisonment for 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

None of those prohibitions affect in any way whatever the right of any individual to quit his employment at any time he sees fit. Of course, there are certain limitations, I think, to the right of one to quit his employment; for instance, if a railroad engineer starts the mechanism of his locomotive and then abandons it and leaves the train to go to its destruction, he will be guilty of crime and responsible for the death of passengers and the destruction of the train if this should be caused by his act; just as a physician who had assumed the obligation of caring for a patient and at some critical time in the operation should abandon it and thereby cause the death of the patient would be guilty of a crime.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Has the Senator introduced the bill which he read?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have introduced it this morning.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am very glad to know that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I shall ask its reference to the appropriate committee, and I should like to secure the cooperation of the Senator from New Jersey in getting early consideration for it. I ask leave briefly to state the purposes which I have had in introducing this measure and in asking for its prompt consideration.

Mr. President, any complaint which railroad employees may have affecting the terms or conditions of their employment should be fairly investigated by the Government, and the Government should use its influence to bring about a just and fair settlement. Congress has provided a labor board for the hearing of such complaints, and for some years there has existed a Board of Labor Conciliation, which has been available for the consideration and adjustment of such disputes.

I have already commented upon the limitations of the right to quit employment, which, in general and under normal conditions, nobody questions, and which, in my opinion, is not involved in the problems with which it is necessary for Congress to deal. There is a question, however, and it is one of vital importance, as to the right of railroad employees, or others, to induce others so employed to leave their employment or to prevent persons from entering such employment, with the intent of obstructing commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. I may say that that is what constitutes a strike. A strike does not come about merely by men quitting their employment of their own initiative; it comes about by a widespread organization, which operates among the employees, and deliberately, with great care and by the expenditure of vast resources, conspires and persuades, and very frequently coerces employees and organizes them for the purpose not merely of quitting their employment but with the ultimate object of tying up the railroads and of absolutely cutting off the flow of commodities in interstate commerce, and thereby bringing the community to such a condition of starvation or of inconvenience or of suffering for the very necessities of life that it will be compelled by means of this system of terrorism to submit to the economic demands of those who have control of the organization which brings about the interruption of traffic. That, in its last analysis, is a government by force and violence, not a government by law; it is not a government by the people; it is a government by a class, by a coterie, by a junta, by a ring within the labor union which secures control of the organization and operates, in secret very largely and very frequently, against the will of the majority of the employees themselves; and, as in this case from which the railroads are suffering now, to the injury and to the suffering of the laboring men of the country who are thrown out of employment, by having factories shut down because supplies can not be obtained through the ordinary process of transportation.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator that, while the remedies he proposes may be very good, they will never be effective to meet such a situation in advance, as it ought to be met, unless there is given to the courts the power to restrain these acts by injunction. It is too late after the deed shall have been accomplished to say that the men may be put in prison. What we need is to have the courts armed with authority to stop it in advance. We need preventive justice as well as punitive justice.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The right of injunction, I apprehend, now exists. I myself think there are many things which could be done under the existing law by vigorous and prompt action of the proper executive authority that would have modified and, if taken in time, would have prevented a great deal of the loss which has resulted from the present strike. I think that a little of the kind of action that three or four Presidents we have had in our history—and I might name George Washington, Andrew Jackson, Grover Cleveland, and Theodore Roosevelt—certain types of action that they took in crises of this importance would, perhaps, bring about a solution of many of these complications. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that where irreparable injury—a well-known ground of injunction—will result from the plans and purposes of an organization, that remedy should be used, but there ought to be, in addition, a penal law which, by the imposition of penalties, will operate to deter the commission of crimes, just as the penalty against murder or robbery or arson operates to prevent the commission of those crimes.

I may say incidentally that where a cessation of transportation is brought about and food is cut off from the congested communities of the country, it frequently results in just that sort of a crime. It results in the death of people, and I am not sure but that people have already died by reason of the existing strike in some of the cities where, I understand, milk supplies have been cut off from babies, and where food supplies, which were inadequate before the strike was called, are already getting shorter. If such commerce can be obstructed and prevented by these men, then the life of the Nation and the Government itself is at the mercy of those who by persuasion or coercion bring transportation to a stop.

Powerful organizations supplied with ample financial resources are endeavoring to persuade all railroad employees to quit work and to prevent others from entering into such employment, with the avowed purpose of preventing the movement of commodities in interstate commerce. Already truck farmers are plowing up their crops, food is rotting on the docks, babies are dying for want of milk, and whole communities are confronted with starvation.

All of this is said to be because Joseph Grunau, a switchman, was discharged. In other words, the outlaw unions claim the right to dictate the management of the railroads, and in order to enforce this claim they are willing to throw their fellow workmen throughout the country out of work, to bring the families of working men to want and suffering, and to cut off the food supply of the Nation. It is Bolshevism pure and simple. It is backed up by every anarchist and revolutionist, alien or domestic, both of the outdoor and parlor variety.

The Constitution vests Congress with the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. This power implies a duty. The power to regulate imposes the obligation to protect. Upon the exercise of this trust depends the integrity of the Government and the safety and very life of the people.

If the management of the railroads is to be taken over by the employees in defiance of the Government and the people, and the control of commerce is to be secured by the revolutionary means of cutting off supplies from the people, then Congress will have been divested of its powers, and free government is suspended and government by dictation of an outlaw labor union substituted in its place.

Control of the railroads by stopping their operation and so bringing to a standstill the industrial processes of the Nation and subjecting the people to starvation, unemployment, and industrial chaos is as truly control by force and violence as any military dictatorship could be. The mails are obstructed. Government ships are prevented from operating. The entire business of the Government is embarrassed and some of its functions suspended by this violent means. The Government should act for the protection of its own agencies as well as for the regulation of commerce in general between its citizens.

In the interest of peace and order and of that security of person and property which is the essential foundation of any civilized free government and in the protection of the functions of the government itself, the revolutionary organization which is trying to enforce its demands by cutting off food supplies from the Nation should be required to submit its industrial complaints, if it has any of real merit, to Government tribunals which are available for that purpose.

A dispute about a title to property is not subject to settlement by force and violence, but must be submitted to tribunals provided by law, and it is equally essential to free government that economic disputes involving transportation or essential industries shall not be determined by violence and coercion, but must likewise be submitted to the law.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I sincerely trust that the suggestion offered by the Senator from Washington will help to meet the situation with which we are now confronted, but I am doubtful as to its efficacy. I am afraid it will not reach the real kernel of the difficulties as I have to some extent in the last three days personally observed them. I have been in New York and northern New Jersey, having returned to Washington last evening. I was on a train between Manhattan Transfer and the Terminal of the Pennsylvania Railroad in New York between three and four hours waiting for it to be drawn into the station. That, of course, is merely a personal inconvenience, and means in itself but little; but I think the time has arrived when, if we have not laws sufficient to reach the situation that now exists in a way that will give something like permanent relief, it is the duty of Congress to endeavor to solve the problem, so that relief may be afforded.

Representing, in part, the State of New Jersey, I telephoned the Department of Justice this morning, thoroughly recognizing their great difficulties at this time. Hundreds of thousands of citizens in the northern end of New Jersey are unable to go to their business in New York, where they are employed; hundreds of thousands of tons of food material are now lying on the various docks in New Jersey terminals awaiting transportation. The Department of Justice replied that they were investigating the matter. As I recall their answer, there were two possible methods to pursue: One through establishing that a conspiracy exists—I am not a lawyer and my explanation of that may not be entirely correct—and the other under the Lever law. They hope to arrive at a decision in the very near future, but I am afraid any decision they may arrive at and proceed under will, as I have inferred, not give the relief which the situation demands.

We have been patching up temporarily these labor troubles from time to time ever since the war. Some of the situations have been met in a way that has brought some results. Others are said by the Department of Justice to furnish more difficult conditions, and I believe this is one of them. We must meet this situation at some time. Perhaps it will bring about a great deal of suffering and loss of life before we do come to a solution of the problem. I am afraid the American people are too prone to forget in a very few hours the inconvenience of yesterday and go on hoping that it will not occur again; but I think that if the law does not provide now—and I believe it does not—for some control before the strike, or whatever it may be termed, then it is the absolute duty of Congress to prepare for that situation, rather than try alone always to correct it after the men have left their employment and the condition exists which exists at this moment. In other words, I think it should be a misdemeanor or some other offense—I will not attempt to analyze the type—for any body of men together, to the extent that it would cripple operation, to leave their employment without giving due notice and stating their grievances, where such action will result in the suffering of an innocent public.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator, I understand, has just said that in his opinion no measure would be of any benefit which merely provided for punishment of the act after the act had occurred. How would the Senator apply such a law as that which he proposes to men for quitting employment at any time except after they had quit?

Mr. EDGE. It is obvious you could not. I will supplement the general statement I have made by saying that of course there should be punishment for all crime after the crime is committed; but I am suggesting a type of law that would make it a misdemeanor when the man quits, if he did not give a reasonable notice, where such action would result in the suffering of an innocent public. I do not in any way, by suggesting that, attempt to make it appear, and I do not believe I do, that after the man has left his employment he should be beyond the purview of the law. Of course, he should not. I am simply trying to find some method that may in some way deter or discourage the man or the conspiracy of a number of men, such as has happened now, apparently, leaving their employment before giving some notice of what their grievance may be.

I have no bill, or at least I have not attempted to draw a bill, to meet that situation. I sincerely hope that the suggested law presented by the Senator from Washington can be worked out to meet that situation; but I have about reached the conclusion that if we can be of any benefit in this matter it must be with the idea of reaching the man before he actually leaves or making it a misdemeanor when he does rather than spending time and money to find out if a conspiracy or something of that kind exists after thirty or forty thousand men are out of their jobs and all the commerce of the country is being held up. It seems to me that by taking that forward step we will do a great deal to discourage a duplication of the present situation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the American Congress is very largely to blame for the unfortunate industrial conditions now confronting the country. The legislation proposed to meet the situation is merely an illustration of our methods of dealing with economic questions, and particularly when they become acute.

If I may paraphrase an ancient expression, we have sowed the wind and we are reaping the whirlwind. How extensive that whirlwind may become, how destructive in its consequences, is a matter perhaps for speculation, but of genuine apprehension nevertheless.

The procedure of the American Congress has been characterized during the last 50 or 60 years by its liberal grants of privilege, either in the shape of franchises or largesses to combinations of capital, or by the granting of exemptions from the operation of general laws to organizations of men. In the first instance, the beneficiaries of privilege waxed strong and yet stronger until they menaced the welfare and the future of the country, aroused the opposition of all thinking men, divided the membership of a great national party, and justly received with others the denunciation of organized labor. They were finally made subject to a series of legislative restrictions the value of which is still a matter for speculation.

Learning the lesson which the advantage of special legislation conferred upon its beneficiaries, organized labor, readily imitative, adopted the identical policy which it denounced when exercised by others, and by the sheer force of its political power has secured from Congress in almost every instance the legislation it has demanded; and that legislation has exempted it from the operation of many salutary laws on the one hand, and therefore from responsibility on the other, giving it, in other words, but in a different form, precisely what we have doled out ad nauseam to other combinations.

It is not necessary to again recount the many instances of privileged legislation which organizations of men have enjoyed and still enjoy, nor, indeed, to focus attention at any length upon the very natural manner in which these privileges have been utilized. Suffice it to say that we are able by our legislation to attempt the control of merely one form of monopoly, to restrict the operation of merely one form of trust, while on the other hand we have expressly exempted other forms which may become equally oppressive and equally destructive, both of society and of government, and when the logical results follow we propose to meet them by restrictive legislation which will not even be considered by this Congress, for the very good reason that the presidential election looms in the immediate future, and the suffering and starvation of the great metropolitan centers of the country are secondary to the importance of that election in the minds of Senators and Representatives. Why, there is no more probability of the serious consideration of the bill offered by the Senator from Washington at this session than there is, in my judgment, of its effecting anything of a substantial character if it should be enacted into law.

What is the situation? We are confronted with what the older organizations of labor call an outlaw strike—a strike condemned not only by every thinking man and woman in the country, but as well by the labor organizations hitherto recognized as controlling these various elements of labor; but it is an effectual strike just the same. I am not surprised at it. I only hope that it will not increase beyond its present dimensions.

You, Mr. President [Mr. CUMMINS in the chair], were told, as chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, that the so-called Plumb plan would be made the basis of a political campaign in the event Congress should reject the plan and restore the roads to their owners. It was said before your committee or elsewhere, Mr. President—it was certainly said somewhere—that this organization had a fund of several millions behind it, and that this money would be expended in propaganda to enforce Government ownership upon the people. We also know that through sinister organizations in the country, financed from some mysterious source, and I imagine from Russian sources, acts have occurred, all bearing in the direction of and intending to effectuate, in my judgment, that identical object. The fact that the first direct action is aimed at the transportation system rather confirms that view, because a railroad man knows as well as anyone else, and perhaps better than anyone else, that whatever disturbs the normal transportation system of the country necessarily injures and disorganizes the entire body politic. The paralysis of transportation inevitably causes great industrial institutions to suspend and throws hundreds of thousands of men out of employment, whose discontent furnishes a fertile soil for the increase of propaganda.

There is nothing haphazard about this strike, in my judgment, Mr. President. It betrays an organization, thorough, systematized, acting upon common lines of previously conceived effort, and punishing if not designed to punish 110,000,000 innocent people so severely as to compel their adhesion to or their acquiescence in any measure demanded by extreme leaders, of which the Plumb plan is one.

Henry George long ago said that the principle of organized labor was opposed to the principles of the Golden Rule, and he might have said to the principles of even-handed justice. This strike is an excellent illustration of its truth. Great cities like New York and Chicago are dependent for daily supplies of necessary foodstuffs upon our transportation system. The sick in hospitals, the babes in their mothers' arms, school children—all classes and conditions of men requiring daily sustenance for their physical existence—are brought face to face with want and possible starvation. But what do these people care how the unoffending people of this country shall suffer or possibly lose their lives, so long as the politico-industrial purposes of the movement shall have been accomplished? There is neither mercy nor pity in such conduct. Nor is there any pretense of justice.

Mr. President, the movement is as heartless as Bolshevism itself; and, indeed, it is a form of the horrid thing thus designated. Death is death, whether it comes by violence, by disease, by starvation, or by the normal processes of nature. Suffering is suffering, whatever its cause; and we know that the man and woman who suffer, and particularly when the causes of the suffering are complicated and little understood, are easily led to cooperation in acts of violence or injustice threatening at times the very life of the Nation where they occur.

Mr. President, I am very glad that this strike does not receive the countenance of the official heads of the brotherhoods and of the other great labor organizations. But is it not true, Mr. President, that the strikers are following the example which those people have set in the past? The only difference between this railroad strike and the coal strike lies in the fact that the one was said to be officially authorized and the other was not. Inherently, there is no difference, for both affect key industries, and both are productive of the same consequences. Both are therefore equally reprehensible.

The committee investigating the steel strike learned that the leaders in the so-called I. W. W. movement were engaged in what they called the process of "boring from within"; that is to say, their modern policy consists in joining the American Federation of Labor for the purpose of destroying its constituents. We have not heard, Mr. President, that the policy has been abandoned. Nothing in the investigation indicates any purpose to abandon it. We have not heard that it has lost in enthusiasm. Is it surprising, then, to conclude that the boring from within process has been a constant policy, and that it is effecting the identical disintegration for which it was intended, and that it has gone so far as to produce this form of rebellion against duly constituted labor authorities? It did not succeed in the coal strike because the Government, to use the expression of a distinguished statesman, "First shook its fist, then its finger, in the face of the organization"; first enjoined, and then compromised with it, at the same time assuring the people of the United States that the tax upon coal consumption would not be increased.

That promise has borne ghastly fruit, Mr. President. It would be amusing if it were not tragic, in view of the recent rise of $2 a ton in coal, whereby, notwithstanding these insistent assurances, as usual the increased cost is saddled upon the shoulders of the poor, unorganized consumer, who apparently exists for no purpose on earth except to be robbed in front, robbed on the right, robbed on the left, and robbed behind; he seems to enjoy it, because all he does is to occasionally protest, and then express with us the wonder how all this is going to end.

I make the prediction now that this outlaw strike, so called, if the Government interferes, will be disposed of just as the coal strike was, and that the outlaws will get what they demand, to wit, a large increase in their wages, notwithstanding one of the brotherhood heads declares that the question of wages was an afterthought; and the good people will bear their burden, feeling a sense of momentary relief, and hoping against hope, and against all their experience, that, after all, the trouble is now over. But it will not be. Mr. President, it will prove to be another entering wedge in a series of well-designed and well-planned movements, which are the legitimate outgrowth of the privilege and lack of responsibility which labor everywhere now enjoys.

Mr. President, I think I know of a remedy for these conditions, though I do not know how effectual it might be. It is hardly worth while stating it, for Senators on both sides of the aisle will not even consider it, unless the difficulty swells into the proportions of a rebellion and bloodshed and the destruction of property become the fruits of its activities.

The first step is to repeal all forms of privileged legislation on our statute books and make every man and every corporation alike subject to the laws. No other condition is consistent with free government; no other system can be reconciled with American institutions and our oft-repeated declaration of equality before the law.

Another is to require these organizations to incorporate, so that they may bear the responsibilities and therefore the consequences of their actions. Mr. President, the corporations, as bad as they are, infamous as many of their demands upon Congress for legislation have been, are yet organized entities, subject to the jurisdiction of the courts and against which the processes of justice may be invoked. It is not so with these organizations.

Think of the damage caused by this strike up to the present time; the shutting down of industries, inconveniences to travelers, the stagnation of perishable freight that is probably now or soon will become valueless, the disturbance of business, the suffering and privation to great communities for which there is no remedy whatever. The loss is irreparable because no legal responsibility rests upon any man or any organization. We could once truly boast that for every wrong the law afforded a remedy. Such is not the case to-day. If the wrong be inflicted by organizations of men, the damage is final; the wrong must forever remain unredressed.

Suppose the Pennsylvania Co. should conclude—and it has the same right to do so that the men working for it have—to suspend the operations of that great system until the Interstate Commerce Commission acceded to its demand for increased freight and passenger rates. Of course, the conditions now existing would perhaps be magnified. Nobody would denounce it more loudly than the men now engaged in striking. Conditions would be terrible. But those injured would at least have their right to redress against that concern by summoning it into the courts by attaching its property, by garnisheeing its income, and by resorting to all of the legal processes which are utilized for the settlement of private controversies. But we have freed an immense proportion, perhaps 25 per cent, of the voting population of the United States from all these responsibilities. Yet some of us express surprise at the excesses in which they are indulging. Why should they not indulge in them? We have invited it by our legislation. We should have foreseen it. Some, perhaps, did foresee it. But the political interests and ambitions of the great political parties of the country, swayed by fear and prompted by hope, have been deftly manipulated by these great organizations to their own interest and benefit, while the people have suffered, as the innocent always suffer, for the offenses of the guilty.

They know that we will do nothing, Mr. President, except to investigate. On Friday we authorized the Committee on Interstate Commerce to investigate, and I have no doubt that committee will go through the solemn farce of inquiring into the causes of this strike, and make a report, which nobody will read, and about which nobody will care. But that is all we will do.

Do you tell me that it is possible for us, unless we are face to face with an emergency so great in its proportion as to threaten our existence, to consider any legislation upon this subject prior to the first Tuesday after the first Monday of next November? The head of the Department of Justice is a candidate for the Presidency. Other administration heads have undeveloped hopes. This Chamber is half empty because senatorial aspirants for the Presidency are out upon the stump making their several campaigns. That is true of both sides of the Chamber, more largely, perhaps, of the other side, which seems to think that its prospects are the more brilliant at this time. That being the case, Mr. President, our experience tells us that we will point with pride and view with alarm, but wait until the people shall have disposed of the issues to be presented to them and the election shall be over. Then what will be done depends upon how we construe the views of the people.

Yes; this is a great country, a country where every man is equal before the law, a country which my distinguished friend from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] very properly and very naturally desires shall extend the beneficence of its protection to every citizen, who must be permitted to work or not as he sees fit, who may or may not, as his judgment dictates, join a labor organization.

Yesterday morning the dispatches announced that in one of the secret meetings of the strikers in Chicago an individual attendant expressed the hope and desire that they would resume work, and the dispatches also announced in the most nonchalant way that he was summarily killed. Whether he was beaten to death, torn limb from limb, or otherwise disposed of is immaterial, but the fact is that the mere suggestion of a return to work cost that poor devil his life, and it would not surprise me if the murderers were not even indicted for it. It is dangerous to make an inquiry into a murder of that kind, lest you lose the votes of the murderers, and that might affect the result in Illinois. So it will be sidestepped. But we will continue mouthing the great doctrine that all men are created equal, while all Americans facing such conditions and protesting against them may share the same fate. I have no doubt the victim I have referred to is not the only one.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I notice that about the same time in Chicago, according to the apparently authoritative press reports, one John Krintz, a striker, who proposed that the men should return to work, was shot. I do not know whether that is the same man or not.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope it is the same one, yet I would not be surprised if there were more than one casualty of that sort.

Mr. POINDEXTER. At the same time the following is reported:

> One E. C. Esty, a C. Y. A. organizer, who participated in the Gary steel strike and several labor disturbances, said, "They call me a rebel. I am proud to be a rebel. In 1910 I had charge of a railroad strike in Minneapolis and St. Paul. The men all went out and stayed out.
> "I went down to the I. W. W. headquarters and got some help. Then one day four passenger trains were wrecked. The next day seven freight trains were wrecked. Then we sent word to the railroads that if they didn't come across we would tear down the roundhouse. They didn't answer—we did. The roundhouse was torn down.
> "Then the railroads begged for mercy and asked to meet us. We told them to come to us. There was a meeting. The union drew up a contract and the railroad refused it. The next day we blew up a bridge. That night an ice jam formed in the river and tore down the rest of the bridge, so they don't know to this day who did the job. But we won the strike."

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I saw that also. If I were a betting man, which I am not, I would wager 10 to 1 that the State authorities, assuming that statement to be true, never enforced the law against Esty or inquired into the outrage.

There is another difficulty in the present situation. We have laws enough; there are plenty of laws in New Jersey, in Colorado, and in the other States to meet these identical situations, but the State officials, like ourselves, think more of succeeding themselves than they do of enforcing the penal laws against organized outrage. This is the most sinister feature of the present-time laws that are inoperative; laws which can be violated with impunity are worse than no laws at all. Before we enact new ones to be flouted let us test the efficacy of those we have.

Of course, the man who can violate the law with impunity is bound to do so. It is a short cut to getting what he wants. If I am strong enough to take my friend, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], by the throat and relieve him of his watch and his pocketbook, and conscious of my ability to do it with impunity as regards the law, it becomes the easiest way for me to get money. I have the same right to do that as any great organization has to use its power for the purpose of starving millions of people into submission to its demands.

All these strikes are outlaw strikes, which affect or involve the semipublic agencies upon which the public depends for its comfort and existence. It is not surprising, therefore, that in the early days of the war, before we entered into the struggle, the hyphenated citizen here utilized and encouraged that form of domestic disturbance to weaken as far as possible our capacity to furnish ammunition and supplies to the Allies. It is that which Lenin preaches and which Martens practices. Martens doubtless would have been deported, as he ought to have been long ago, but for insistence by the Committee on Foreign Relations that he be kept here for the purpose of examination and reexamination and cross-examination.

Mr. Gompers in yesterday morning's paper was quoted as saying, and in a somewhat triumphant tone, I imagine, from the phraseology of the telegram, that Congress had seen fit to declare strikes unlawful and that this was a strike of the individual, not a strike of an organization, and you could almost see between the lines a query of "How do you like it?" In this morning's paper he is quoted as saying that this unfortunate condition is due to an attempt by Congress to insert an antistrike clause in the railroad bill, to agitation of the subject creating a discontent which has culminated in this difficulty. I think it is far more reasonable and consistent to say that it is a consequence of the failure of Congress to enact the Senate bill practically in form as it was reported to us by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I believe firmly that if we had had the courage to stand by our guns and write into the legislation of this country a statute forbidding, under penalties, these mass strikes of men engaged in semipublic occupations, this unfortunate difficulty might not have occurred. Whether it would have occurred or not, the agencies of justice would have been armed with a law, coupled with responsibility to enforce it, which would have tested our power to control such movements. And I am sure it would have minimized the conditions now unfortunately so critical in the country.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. Does not the Senator think the time has come and that it is now our duty to repeal all class legislation?

Mr. THOMAS. I said so just a moment ago.

Mr. DIAL. Pardon me, I did not hear the Senator say it.

Mr. THOMAS. The time has come, but if the Senator lays the flattering unction to his soul that we will do it he is subject to disappointment.

Mr. DIAL. I hope, nevertheless, that we may do it.

Mr. THOMAS. What we on this side of the aisle want to do is to elect a Democrat President. What those on the other side of the aisle want to do is to elect a Republican President. We are going to do it, each of us, if we can; consequently we shall, if we can avoid it, offend no man. The consumer is not organized, the taxpayer is discouraged, so let them both go to the devil. We are concerned for the men who speak by organized authority.

Mr. DIAL. I would like to say to the Senator that I voted last year to exempt certain classes from certain legislation, but I have been ashamed of that vote ever since and shall be glad of an opportunity to change it.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, all assertions as to the operation of a bill that never passed are speculative. I may be entirely wrong, but it is certainly a remarkable proposition, if it is true, that strikes flow from the serious efforts of well-intentioned legislators to consider the subject as one of great concern. The moral to be drawn from the contention is to touch nothing that may offend some parts of the public, lest to do so will produce all the consequences you seek to avoid by active legislation.

I want to commend to my Republican friends, because this is addressed to them, or to the Republican national committee, the views of organized labor as expressed by Mr. Gompers, Mr. Woll, and Mr. Morrison as members of the platform committee of the national nonpartisan campaign of the federation. It is very modest as to what the Republican platform should contain. It will come to San Francisco, too, and if you will adopt the program we will go one better and perhaps put something more extreme in our platform. If you fail to take the entire thing, we will probably take it all, and then each claiming to be the only friend of organized labor, each will compete for its vote. I read:

Acceptance of the eight-hour day and the six-day week with Saturday half holiday.
Recognition of American wage earners' right to organize in accordance with their own judgment.
Continued exemption of labor organizations from antitrust laws.
Acceptance of the right of employees to choose their own representatives from within or without the plant.
Recognition of the right of employees to strike.

If the shoemakers in Massachusetts want a barber in New York to represent them in matters of contracts of employment or recognition of the right of employees to strike or any other issue which may come between employer and employee they must have a perfect right to do so, and a failure to recognize the conclusion, of course, means a general disturbance of industry.

Abandonment of the use of the injunction in labor disputes.
Establishment of free Federal employment agencies in the administration of which labor would have a voice.

We had one of those during the war. I think it is still functioning. I have not time now to dissect it, but I have no doubt that its activities have appealed so strongly to these gentlemen that they perceive its value as an agency of organization, and therefore they want it free so far as they are concerned as a permanent institution of the Government.

Minimum age of 16 years for employment of children.
Extension of the Federal workmen's compensation act to all wage earners not protected by State compensation acts.

Of course, the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of such a provision is a matter of no particular consequence between friends or political allies.

Elimination of company welfare and uplift organizations and substitution of welfare work as conducted by labor organizations.

Then the recent statute enacted in Kansas, and now being tested, is denounced as "so antidemocratic as to be reprehensible in the extreme and repugnant to every American concept of justice, freedom, and democracy."

Mr. President, I do not know much about that statute; its purpose, however, is a good one, and I hope it will be thoroughly tested before it shall be abandoned, whatever the opposition to it. In my judgment it is the opposite of everything invoked against it.

Mr. President, I have attempted very feebly, by correspondence and by occasional speeches, to impress upon the public the necessity of a counter organization of the middle class in America. The middle class of this country is the great basis of all our institutions; it is the class which bears the burden of Government, and upon whose shoulders falls the necessity of its support and defense. In 1910 President Diaz said to me, in the City of Mexico, that Mexico would never have a real republic until she had a middle class like that in America, and that one of his purposes through all his administrations was to establish, if possible, such a class before giving to the people the right to exercise the privileges which are so common to every man here, and that is true.

These movements, of which the present strike is, perhaps, a most graphic illustration, tend, consciously or unconsciously, to the undermining of the great middle class of America—the taxpayer, the law-abiding man of intelligence and education, the merchant, the manufacturer, the farmer, the laborer—since every invasion of an industrial character impinges upon his income, his right to earn a living, his ability to enjoy the profits of his industry, and just as surely as there is a future, if these things continue, this great class will more and more feel the impact of the opposing forces of combinations above and combinations below until, robbed and discouraged, losing all interest in the Government of their fathers, they will become indifferent and let it drift to inevitable decay.

God helps those who help themselves, and if this class could only be aroused to the supreme importance of counter organization for the maintenance of their own rights, for the protection of their own liberties, and for the safeguarding of their properties, that would bring to bear upon the Congress a political influence which all would heed, and legislation common to all the citizens of the Republic would be written large upon the statute books of the future. Whatever, Mr. President, we may do or fail to do, in its last analysis, the future of America rests upon its people, and as they shall meet this and kindred crises, so will be the future of the United States.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is anxious to get up the Army reorganization bill, and so I shall content myself with merely saying a very few words on this question. I notice also that the Senate takes no interest whatever in it, as it took but little interest in the subject when it was before this body two months ago.

We are aware of the calamity and the suffering in several of the large cities of this country to-day; starvation is threatening some of them; but, Mr. President, it is nothing to the calamity that may happen to this country if there shall be a nation-wide strike on the railroad systems. You might just exactly as well strike against the Government and tie up the Government itself as to paralyze the arteries of trade, the daily operation of which is necessary to the very life of the people. The way industries are organized in the present condition of the economic development of this country and of every other country, transportation is necessary daily to the life of the people.

Mr. President, I wonder how soon the public and the Congress are going to realize that fact. Every facility should be created by law for the settlement of every dispute, so that every man or organization of men working for the railroads shall have their grievances promptly considered, but when that is done the time is coming when men can not be permitted to conspire to take the Nation by its throat and starve it to death. However, the Congress will not now do anything, but the time will come when it will have to act and when it will act.

I sympathize with many classes of labor to-day who are suffering, of course, on account of the great cost of living; but that is beside the question. They can not be permitted by force to stop the transportation of this country any more than they may be permitted to stop the Government of the country; and the quicker they realize it the better.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator that the Army reorganization bill be taken up first.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I inquire if the Senator from Texas insists upon his suggestion at this time?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will defer it until the motion is made to take up the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 1 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.). Morning business is closed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3792, being the Army reorganization bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3792.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Now, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Hale	McNary	Smoot
Borah	Harris	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Harrison	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Swanson

Mr. GERRY. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. LENROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

ARTHUR WENDLE ENGLERT.

Mr. SPENCER. The House passed a bill (H. R. 795) for the relief of Arthur Wendle Englert, giving to him $500 for some improvements that he had made upon his farm, to which the Government patent was found to be imperfect. The Senate felt that the amount ought to be $749.50, and passed the bill with that amendment. The House has refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate, and I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 795) for the relief of Arthur Wendle Englert, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I had supposed that the calendar would be considered this morning. There is a bill on the calendar that is in a very peculiar situation. I want to explain the situation to the Senator from New York, and possibly he will permit it to come up. If it requires any discussion at all, I will not press it, but it ought to go to conference.

The bill is what is known as the bill for vocational training for men hurt in industry. It was passed by the Senate in January or February. The bill went to the House, and the same bill had been introduced in the House. We put some amendments on it in the Senate, and the House passed the other bill, which was practically identical with this one. It came back to the Senate under a different name, and had to go to the Committee on Education and Labor.

We reported out that bill, striking out everything after the enacting clause, and substituting the bill that has heretofore been passed by the Senate.

I have not been able to be here for the last two or three Monday mornings, but this bill ought to go to conference. The Senate has already passed on it; and, if the Senator from New York has no objection, I will ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily and that Order of Business 319 be taken up by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have no objection, unless, of course, it gives rise to an extended debate, in which event I shall have to protect the military bill.

Mr. KENYON. If it gives rise to any discussion, I shall not press it at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Iowa?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4438) to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment, which had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with an amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to say that the amendment in the nature of a substitute is exactly the same as the bill that passed the Senate, except that we do not put it into effect for another year. We do nothing this year. The appropriation does not commence until next year. It was discussed, and very fully discussed, and passed by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the appropriation made for this year been reduced at all, or has it been cut out entirely?

Mr. KENYON. There is no appropriation. It is omitted entirely. The object was to try to take up this work after the soldier work had been disposed of.

Now, Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and, if possible, the second reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The amendment proposed by the committee will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That in order to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or in any legitimate occupation and their return to civil employment there is hereby appropriated for the use of the States, subject to the provisions of this act, for the purpose of cooperating with them in the maintenance of vocational rehabilitation of such disabled persons, and in returning vocationally rehabilitated persons to civil employment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the sum of $750,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and thereafter for a period of two years, the sum of $1,000,000 annually. Said sums shall be allotted to the States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population in the United States, not including Territories, outlying possessions, and the District of Columbia, according to the last preceding United States census: Provided, That the allotment of funds to any State shall not be less than a minimum of $5,000 for any fiscal year. And there is hereby appropriated the following sums, or so much thereof as may be needed, which shall be used for the purpose of providing the minimum allotment to the States provided for in this section for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the sum of $46,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and annually thereafter, the sum of $34,000.

All moneys expended under the provisions of this act from appropriations provided by section 1 shall be upon the condition (1) that for each dollar of Federal money expended there shall be expended in the State under the supervision and control of the State board at least an equal amount for the same purpose: Provided, That no portion of the appropriation made by this act shall be used by any institution for handicapped persons except for the special training of such individuals entitled to the benefits of this act as shall be determined by the Federal board; (2) that the State board shall annually submit to the Federal board for approval plans showing (a) the kinds of vocational rehabilitation and schemes of placement for which it is proposed the appropriation shall be used; (b) the plan of administration and supervision; (c) courses of study; (d) methods of instruction; (e) qualification of teachers, supervisors, directors, and other necessary administrative officers or employees; (f) plans for the training of teachers, supervisors, and directors; (3) that the State board shall make an annual report to the Federal board on or before September 1 of each year on the work done in the State and on the receipts and expenditures of money under the provisions of this act; (4) that no portion of any moneys appropriated by this act for the benefit of the States shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, preservation, erection, or repair of any building or buildings or equipment, or for the purchase or rental of any lands; (5) that all courses for vocational rehabilitation given under the supervision and control of the State board and all courses for vocational rehabilitation maintained shall be available, under such rules and regulations as the Federal board shall prescribe, to any civil employee of the United States disabled while in the performance of his duty.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of this act the term "persons disabled" shall be construed to mean any person who, by reason of a physical defect or infirmity, whether congenital or acquired by accident, injury, or disease, is, or may be expected to be, totally or partially incapacitated for remunerative occupation; the term "rehabilitation" shall be construed to mean the rendering of a person disabled fit to engage in a remunerative occupation.

SEC. 3. That in order to secure the benefits of the appropriations provided by section 1 any State shall, through the legislative authority thereof, (1) accept the provisions of this act; (2) empower and direct the board designated or created as the State board for vocational education to cooperate in the administration of the provisions of the vocational education act approved February 23, 1917, to cooperate as herein provided with the Federal Board for Vocational Education in the administration of the provisions of this act; (3) in those States where a State workmen's compensation board, or other State board, department, or agency exists, charged with the administration of the State workmen's compensation or liability laws, the legislature shall provide that a plan of cooperation be formulated between such State board, department, or agency and the State board charged with the administration of this act, such plan to be effective when approved by the governor of the State; (4) provide for the supervision and support of the courses of vocational rehabilitation to be provided by the State board in carrying out the provisions of this act; (5) appoint as custodian for said appropriations its state treasurer, who shall receive and provide for the proper custody and disbursement of all money paid to the State from said appropriations. In any State the legislature of which does not meet in regular session between the date of the passage of this act and December 31, 1920, if the governor of that State shall accept the provisions of this act, such State shall be entitled to the benefits of this act until the legislature of such State meets in due course and has been in session 60 days.

SEC. 4. That the Federal Board for Vocational Education shall have power to cooperate with State boards in carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act, and is hereby authorized to make and establish such rules and regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to carry into effect the provisions of this act; to provide for the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their return to civil employment and to cooperate, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, with such public and private agencies as it may deem advisable. It shall be the duty of said board (1) to examine plans submitted by the State boards and approve the same if believed to be feasible and found to be in conformity with the provisions and purposes of this act; (2) to ascertain annually whether the several States are using or are prepared to use the money received by them in accordance with the provisions of this act; (3) to certify on or before the 1st day of January of each year to the Secretary of the Treasury each State which has accepted the provisions of this act and complied therewith, together with the amount which each State is entitled to receive under the provisions of this act; (4) to deduct from the next succeeding allotment to any State whenever any portion of the fund annually allotted has not been expended for the purpose provided for in this act a sum equal to such unexpended portion; (5) to withhold the allotment of moneys to any State whenever it shall be determined that moneys allotted are not being expended for the purposes and conditions of this act; (6) to require the replacement by withholding subsequent allotments of any portion of the moneys received by the custodian of any State under this act that by any action or contingency is diminished or lost: Provided, That if any allotment is withheld from any State, the State board of such State may appeal to the Congress of the United States, and if the Congress shall not, within one year from the time of said appeal, direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the certification of the Federal board as provided in this act, shall pay quarterly to the custodian of each State appointed as herein provided the moneys to which it is entitled under the provisions of this act. The money so received by the custodian for any State shall be paid out on the requisition of the State board as reimbursement for services already rendered or expenditures already incurred and approved by said State board. The Federal Board for Vocational Education shall make an annual report to the Congress on or before December 1 on the administration of this act and shall include in such report the reports made by the State boards on the administration of this act by each State and the expenditure of the money allotted to each State.

SEC. 6. That there is hereby appropriated to the Federal Board for Vocational Education the sum of $75,000 annually for a period of four years for the purpose of making studies, investigations, and reports regarding the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their placements in suitable or gainful occupations, and for the administrative expenses of said board incident to performing the duties imposed by this act, including salaries of such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, as the board may deem necessary, actual traveling and other necessary expenses incurred by the members of the board and by its employees, under its orders, including attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations, rent and equipment of offices in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference, law books, and periodicals, stationery, typewriters and exchange thereof, miscellaneous supplies, postage on foreign mail, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, and all other necessary expenses.

A full report of all expenses under this section, including names of all employees and salaries paid them, traveling expenses and other expenses incurred by each and every employee and by members of the board, shall be submitted annually to Congress by the board.

No salaries shall be paid out of the fund provided in this section in excess of the following amounts: At the rate of $5,000 per annum, to not more than one person; at the rate of $4,000 per annum each, to not more than four persons; at the rate of $3,500 per annum each, to not more than five persons; and no other employee shall receive compensation at a rate in excess of $2,500 per annum: Provided, That no person receiving compensation at less than $3,500 per annum shall receive in excess of the amount of compensation paid in the regular departments of the Government for like or similar services.

SEC. 7. That the Federal Board for Vocational Education is hereby authorized and empowered to receive such gifts and donations from either public or private sources as may be offered unconditionally. All moneys received as gifts or donations shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and shall constitute a permanent fund, to be called the "Special fund for vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons," to be used under the direction of the said board to defray the expenses of providing and maintaining courses of vocational rehabilitation in special cases, including the payment of necessary expenses of persons undergoing training. A full report of all gifts and donations offered and accepted, together with the names of the donors and the respective amounts contributed by each, and all disbursements therefrom shall be submitted annually to Congress by said board: Provided, That no discrimination shall be made or permitted for or against any person or persons who are entitled to the benefits of this act because of membership or nonmembership in any industrial, fraternal, or private organization of any kind under a penalty of $200 for every violation thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. KENYON, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

Mr. LENROOT. The pending amendment, I think, is to strike out, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is to strike out, and, as the Chair understands it, this is a preferential motion.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 66, line 2, after the word "desire," insert:

Provided further, That not more than 100,000 applications for training under the provisions of this section shall be accepted annually.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I voted for the amendments modifying the committee's recommendations from compulsory military training to voluntary military training, and this amendment will limit the number who can be accepted each year for voluntary training to 100,000.

With reference to the original recommendations of the committee for compulsory military training—and I shall say only a word concerning them—if it had been necessary to occupy the time of the Senate in demonstrating what the compulsory military training would have cost, I am satisfied we would have been easily able to show that, instead of the estimate made by the committee, it would have cost this country at least $500,000,000 annually.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I just at this moment heard the Senator's amendment, and am disposed to favor it; but permit me to suggest that there is not anything in the amendment indicating how these troops shall be distributed or how they shall be selected. It seemed to me that some reference should be made to the population of the several States, and that they should be distributed among the States. Also, it would seem to me that it might be well to authorize the adoption of certain rules under which they should be selected; and those, perhaps, first coming should be first accepted.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad the Senator has suggested adding to the amendment that the selection shall be made under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the President. If I may, I will add to my amendment, "that selection of applicants shall be made under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the President."

Mr. POMERENE. May I suggest also that they should be distributed as nearly as may be among the several States in proportion to their population?

Mr. LENROOT. It seems to me that it would be assumed that that would be done. However, if the Senator desires to offer that amendment, I should be willing to accept it.

Mr. POMERENE. That would indicate to the President, at least, what was the desire of the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will permit the Chair, the amendment provides that no more than 100,000 applications for training shall be accepted. Does not the Senator think the words "men applying" should be substituted for "applications"?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I say not more than 100,000 applications should be accepted annually. It seems to me that covers it. What has the Senator in mind?

Mr. McKELLAR (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). The Senator's amendment provides that not more than 100,000 applications for training under the provisions of the section shall be accepted annually; that is, not more than 100,000 applications shall be accepted. I imagine the Senator intends that not more than 100,000 men shall be accepted of those who apply.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. It strikes me that the wording might be changed just a little, although I do not suggest how it should be modified.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator intend that there shall be received only 100,000 applications or that only 100,000 men of those who apply shall be received? There may be 100,000 applications, and out of that number 25 per cent may be incapacitated from physical defects for training.

Mr. LENROOT. The amendment states that not more than 100,000 applications shall be accepted. What I have in mind is to limit the number who may be trained annually under the terms of this section to 100,000. If the language does not accomplish that result, I shall be glad to accept any suggestion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The reason why I called the Senator's attention to it is because of the fact that the report of the Provost Marshal General showed a very large percentage of young men incapacitated for military duty; so that there might be, we will say, 125,000 making application for training and 25,000 or more may not be fitted for training.

Mr. LENROOT. I see the Senator's point, and if I may modify the amendment, Mr. President, I would make it read this way:

That not more than 100,000 applicants for enlistment for training shall be inducted into the service each year.

That would take care of the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). The Secretary will report the amendment as modified.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I suggest where the amendment should go? All the language from line 19 on page 65 down to the bottom of the page and the first line and a half on page 66 has been stricken out. So the amendment should be inserted on line 19, after the words "two months."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 65, line 19, after the words "two months," insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That not more than 100,000 applicants for enlistment for training shall be inducted into the service each year, the selection of applicants to be under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the President.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, my only purpose in offering this amendment is to limit the expense to which the Government may be put while conducting this experiment, for, under the bill as it now stands, it is wholly an experiment, and Senators will remember that under the bill as it now stands when this training has been completed every person so trained goes right back into civil life without any obligation to the Government of any kind incurred by his voluntary enlistment; that is, he does not go into the guard, he does not go into the reserves, and when their training is over there is no way by which the services of those particular men can be utilized by the Government, except as the Government may call out the entire body of the citizenship of the country subject to military duty.

If the bill were framed so as to require that a voluntary enlistment for training should carry with it the obligation, for a limited time, to go either into the guard or the reserves, then there would be no occasion for this limitation, because there would be a clear asset to the Government in the training which it had provided. But as it is, if a hundred thousand men apply for this training, I think, under the estimate of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], it will cost us some $25,000,000, which I think is very much too low, and while I am willing that we should experiment along this line, with the present condition of the Treasury and the certainty of what the condition of the Treasury will be for the next two or three years, we can not afford to spend thirty or forty million dollars a year for training volunteers when at the end of the training they have entered into no obligation to serve their country either in the National Guard or in the Reserves.

If more than a hundred thousand shall apply for training under the provisions of the bill as it now stands, then I think the law should be modified so that one who volunteers for training shall also enter into an obligation that after he has received the benefit of this training he shall for a limited time be under some obligation to render service to the country if emergency shall arise.

When interrupted, Mr. President, I stated that if it had been necessary to show to the Senate that the estimate of the committee of the cost of compulsory military training was too low, we could demonstrate, I am satisfied, that it would cost the country at least $500,000,000 a year. Gen. Marshall, Chief of the Construction Division of the Army, has testified that it will cost $25,000,000 to put our camps in condition for every 150,000 men who are trained. For 600,000 men it would cost in the first instance $100,000,000 for that purpose alone, and if we get 100,000 men, under the provisions of this amendment, under voluntary training, it is going to cost about $20,000,000 in the very first instance to put our camps and cantonments in proper condition. So even with 100,000 men, if we shall secure that many, it is going to cost the Government, in my judgment, more than $50,000,000 the first year for that purpose alone.

However, I do believe that this will be a valuable experiment. I do not know, and no one knows, how many men may take advantage of the provisions of the bill; but it seems to me that where there is no obligation whatever imposed upon an applicant to serve his country in any respect after he has received the training we may have a very large number of applicants who will receive their training at the expense of the Government. That would be a good thing for the country, but under present conditions and conditions in the immediate future I do say that we ought not to expend millions upon millions of dollars for training where the Government will not be able after the training is over to utilize the men who are trained for any emergency which may arise.

Mr. President, just a word more. During the last week it was stated upon the floor of the Senate that there were thousands upon thousands of lives lost in France because the country had not had a system of military training prior to our entry into the war. It is true that the hearings of both committees are full of testimony to the effect that men were sent into the front trenches without knowing how even to load a rifle, without having had any training whatever, and it was little short of murder to send them there. But, Mr. President, that was not because this country had not had universal military training. If we had had universal military training, unless we had had with it everything that was necessary to put an army into action, our men would have had to wait until we secured the rifles, until we secured the ordnance, until we secured the aeroplanes, until we secured all those things that were necessary to accompany putting men into action.

The murder of these boys—because it was murder—was not due to the failure to enact a policy of universal military training prior to our entry into the war. It was due wholly, as every officer who touched upon the subject has testified, to the fact that division commanders in the camps of this country who had trained men in abundance when they were called upon for replacements, instead of those commanders sending their trained men they sent from those camps men who had never received an hour's training and kept their trained men in the camps in this country.

This was clearly brought out before the Committee on Military Affairs at the last hearing upon this subject on March 1 last. Several officers who had served in France testified as to lack of training of men who were in the front trenches, where in every case it appeared that they were sent by officers in this country, knowing that they had not an hour of training, and at the same time those officers had ample numbers of men who had received three, four, six, and eight months of training, but kept them in this country, and, as suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], many of them who had received long training were never sent over at all.

I asked one of those officers this question after he made a statement of the untrained men being sent to the front trenches.

He—

Speaking of the officer—

would be little short of a murderer if he sent men that were untrained, if he could send any others.

This is Mr. Donovan's testimony, that was referred to by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] the other day:

Mr. DONOVAN. The ultimate murderer is the American people, who did not provide for a proper system.

Senator LENROOT. But these four months' training, if we had had it, would have done us no good, because we did not have the equipment and guns. The two must accompany each other, must they not?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes; but ultimately it would have done good, because you would have had that first stage, and the most important stage, already accomplished, because with training will go organization.

That is all true, but I do say that so far as these untrained men being sent to France and to the front trenches in France the fault is due to American officers who permitted it. There ought to be some courts-martial in this country of those officers, because we have enlisted men to-day serving in the penitentiaries because of comparatively trivial offenses, while these officers are going free, and perhaps some of them have had the distinguished service cross being conferred upon them notwithstanding their committing this act of murder upon American boys.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very glad the Senator is discussing this subject. I discussed it very briefly the other day. Since that time I have had two letters from alleged officers bringing me to task and laying the whole blame upon the American people and the Congress, and so forth, and of course accepting none of the blame themselves.

The Senator is on the committee, and I would like to ask him this question: Was it developed during the hearings that there was any occasion when it became necessary to send to the front men who were not trained?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly not. On the contrary, it was testified by officers to whom these men were sent that the untrained men that were sent them, instead of being an advantage were nothing but an encumbrance.

Mr. POMERENE. Was it not a fact also that those men received a certain amount of training in the cantonments here in the United States and later were sent across for intensive training on the other side?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, that was true of the great bulk of our soldiers, but it is true that orders would come to this country for replacements or casuals, and division commanders here, instead of sending over trained men, men who had had training, would send men who would just come into camp and never had any training, but who would be sent to France and from there would be sent to the front trenches.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is true, as the Senator states, that nearly all the men who went over from the United States had some training, but it was not such training in many instances as would have done them any good if they had been sent to fill up battalions and regiments at the front. For instance, many of the men who went over there, I think, were trained in some of the cantonments of this country with cannon that were made out of telegraph poles; some of them were drilled with guns that were simply broomsticks; and many of them were trained with wooden guns that were made in imitation of real guns. So none of these men would know how to fire a cannon or how to fire a gun or to load a gun. I do not say that that was general, but at one time the Military Affairs Committee had pictures of whole cantonments where many of the young men were drilling with broomsticks for guns. So they would not have fared very well on being sent to the front-line trenches.

Mr. LENROOT. There is much in what the Senator says, but there was never any excuse for sending any American boy to France for intensive training or otherwise, if he had not while in this country learned how to load and fire a rifle.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not want the Senator to infer that I am apologizing for that condition. I am in thorough accord with the Senator's views. I think it was nothing short of murder to send those men to the front, particularly if it were true, as some of the officers testified, that men who were well trained and might have been sent were not sent and men who were untrained were sent.

Mr. LENROOT. As the Senator knows, it is undisputed that we did have trained men and that there never was a time when it was necessary to send those boys without any training to the front.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is absolutely true.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will not dwell for a moment upon the untrained general officers who were in command of American forces in France, officers who had never held command over units larger than the regiments as they were constituted for the war? Officers who were commanding divisions in that capacity were as untrained as any private who went untaught in the handling of the rifle. If ever there be an investigation of the actions which were fought in France, to bring out the facts as the facts are being brought out in the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, the American people will understand how utterly untaught and untrained were officers who, in their inexperience, unwittingly sent thousands of men to their death. There is where the want of training was chiefly manifest.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator suffer a further interruption?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I also wish the Senator would touch upon the question of untrained citizenship of men who, when Europe was in conflagration, four years prior to this war, absolutely refused to prepare, and denied the necessary appropriations to the Ordnance and other departments that were asking for them.

Mr. LENROOT. That is a matter of history.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. While the Senator is going into that matter, I hope he will recall that these untrained officers have won the greatest war that was ever fought among men, and it is the highest compliment that could possibly be paid to them when you say that they, untrained as they were, won this great war over the trained armies of Germany when they had had universal military training for more than 100 years. It is a great tribute to the American soldier and to the American officer.

Mr. LENROOT. In what I have said concerning the derelictions of some of the officers I would not for a moment wish to be understood as reflecting upon the great body of officers in the war who were patriotic and who did render distinguished service. I do agree with the Senator from New Jersey that they could and would have rendered better service if they had had better opportunity for training, and, of course, the same is true of the men. But when Senators get up on the floor of the Senate and say that it was because of the failure to have a system of universal military training that our boys were sent to the front without knowing how to load a gun, I say that is not true, and as to such the fault was not with the system. We had trained men who did know how to load their guns, who had all the preliminary training; but because some officers in this country, so far forgetting their duty to their country, so far forgetting their duty to the men who had been sent to them, because they wanted the pick of soldiers in their own command, believing that they would soon have the opportunity to go across, when those men on a call for replacement sent men who were untrained, those were the men who are guilty and should be brought to account.

Mr. McKELLAR. In further substantiation of what the Senator says, as I recall it, it was more than 14 months after our declaration of war, and after we had begun to train our Army, before any of our men were sent to the front-line trenches. Am I correct about that?

Mr. LENROOT. Practically.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it was something like 14 months.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Tennessee has in that sentence made the most eloquent argument for the original bill that has been made upon this floor. Fourteen months after we went to war we commenced to fight!

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see about that. Suppose on April 6 we had had 3,000,000 men trained under the provisions of this bill, how long would it have been before they could have begun to fight?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is that question addressed to me?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I am asking the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume we could have begun our real activities by the middle of the summer of 1917, not with all 4,000,000 men, of course, but we could have had at least three or four hundred thousand men there. Three or four hundred thousand men at that time would have won the war.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator says that. The Senator speaks——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator suffer a further interruption?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not want to get away from this question.

The Senator from New York proposes to train some 3,000,000 men, and I have asked him how long he believed it would have been before they would have been able to begin their actual fighting. He says three or four hundred thousand men could have won the war at that time, in the summer of 1917.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, that is an opinion. I do not speak with authority.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Senator must realize it would have been of enormous influence had we been able to send six or eight divisions to France in the spring of 1917.

Mr. LENROOT. It would have had effect, of course. I wish that we might have done it. We might have sent more men and got into the fight sooner than we did, as the Senator from New York well knows, but it would have been a very limited number; but we did not even send those whom we had trained, so it was not due to the lack of universal military training that we got nobody to the front for 14 months.

Our National Guard divisions were ready and could have gone into the fight long, long before they did, so far as their own training was concerned. No; we could not have gotten into that war to any material extent if we had had universal military training, unless we had had with it all of the equipment that was necessary to put an army into action; and that would have meant a proper complement of airplanes for an army of a million or more men, artillery for an army of a million or more men, and everything else that is necessary to go to make up an army.

If you are going upon that policy, what is the difference between this system and what is known as militarism? Does the Senator propose with compulsory training that we are going to be ready at the drop of the hat to put a million or two million men into the field? If he does, the estimate of $900,000,000 a year for the Army, as he proposes in the bill, would not be half sufficient for the country to make use of the universal compulsory military training that he proposes.

But, Mr. President, I was only answering the arguments that have been made—and one of them was made by the Senator from New York—that the fact that we had untrained boys who went to their death in France because of lack of training was because we had not had a universal military training system in this country; and I am only showing that it was not necessary at any time to send any of those untrained boys to the front; that they were sent only because certain officers desired to keep the trained men for themselves and under their own command.

In the same hearing Senator KNOX, during the testimony, asked Mr. Donovan the following question:

> You take an officer that would send untrained men into the front, do you not think that he was about as morally guilty as if he had sent blank cartridges to the troops?
> Mr. DONOVAN. Yes; but suppose he honestly believed that he would have to lead his own unit into the fight three weeks from then?

Mr. Donovan was a splendid-appearing gentleman, but think of any man excusing the sending of men to the front who did not know how to load or fire a gun by saying that he did not know how soon he might be called upon to lead his own men into the front! If he had been called upon the responsibility for murder would not have been upon him, but it would have been upon those who sent him if he had any considerable number of untrained men under his command.

No, Mr. President, notwithstanding the speeches that have been made here concerning the sending of untrained men to the front, it was not due to any lack of training, but it was due to the criminal action of some of the officers of this country who sent such men into battle. Finally the abuse became so great that the Secretary of War realized that murder was being committed by such action, and the War Department issued an order requiring a certificate from the commanding officer who was ordered to send replacements to the effect that he was sending only trained men. In view of that order, can there be any question concerning what the practice was as to the sending of untrained men to the front?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Did the committee make any investigation as to who the officers were who sent over replacement troops who could not load or fire a gun?

Mr. LENROOT. The committee has not made any such investigation, but I think it should make an investigation of the subject.

Mr. POMERENE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. President, to get back to the amendment. I believe in training; I do not for a moment underestimate the value to the individual of the training that will be afforded by the provisions of the bill as it now stands, but I am opposed to this country, at the time when the other countries of the world are talking about disarmament, entering upon a military policy the very opposite from what the nations of the world are now planning. If we would have preparedness—and I believe we should at all times be better prepared than we have been in the past—there are two ways in which it can be secured. One is in the way of providing for the mobilization of our industries whenever the emergency shall arise, in making provision that if we are called upon to manufacture guns, artillery, and ammunition the plans shall be ready and everything prepared so as to go into it upon a moment's notice. Even then, Mr. President, before we can get the equipment that will be necessary to send an army of any size into the field, we shall have opportunity to give more training than would have been provided by the compulsory system which was contained in the bill.

So far as voluntary military training is concerned, I am perfectly willing that we shall go into it as an experiment, and if it shall be successful I should like to see the law so modified that when one voluntarily enlists for military training he shall at the same time enter into an agreement that for the military training which he receives he shall assume certain obligations to his country thereafter, either by joining the National Guard for a limited time or going into the reserves for a limited time, so that if an emergency shall arise the Government may call upon those who have secured the training at the expense of the Government.

Under the provisions of the bill as it now stands we shall have no such right. If 1 man out of 50 eligible for training receives the training at Government expense, when he is through his training he goes back to his community and the Government can not subsequently avail itself of his services any more than in the case of the man who has received no training at all. That training would be a good thing for the man who takes it, and whenever our finances will warrant it I do not believe that money can be better expended than for such a purpose; but for the next year or two, and possibly three years, I do insist the Government can not afford to spend twenty-five, fifty, or sixty million dollars per year for training men as to whom there will be no obligation to go into the National Guard or the reserves after they have received such training. For that reason, I have offered this amendment limiting the number to 100,000 annually who may receive such training.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, inasmuch as the system of voluntary military training now provided for in the bill has been incorporated in the measure in pursuance of an amendment offered by me, and in view of the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin by his amendment is trying to limit to 100,000 the number of men who may thus voluntarily be trained, I wish to say a few words in opposition to the amendment.

The Senator has mentioned the necessity for economy as one of the reasons why the number to be trained should be limited. If we have learned anything from experience, we must acknowledge that the tremendous cost of the war with Germany and the tremendous burden of expense under which we are now staggering, our bonded indebtedness, and heavy taxation are due to the fact that we were not properly prepared when we declared war; that our preparation began practically three years after Germany, in the first instance, brought on the war; that we prepared under a tremendous inflation due to the war in Europe; and that had we taken some slight means of preparing this Nation moderately—and by "moderately" I mean by the maintenance of a limited Army, practically one-fifth of the size of the Army that we had when the war ended—it would have saved this Nation billions of dollars of taxation.

My effort to save the plan of universal military training by making it voluntary is in order that this country, notwithstanding the blind folly which animates some of the statesmen who are representing their States to-day, may at least in some measure make some preparation outside of the small standing Army that is provided for in this bill, which is scarcely sufficient to police our border and our insular possessions.

An effort has been made to find the culprits who sent a few thousand untrained men into battle. I think that it almost approaches cowardice to say that the culprits are a few officers who, under the stress of the German advance, were forced to send their men into battle. Who are the culprits? Let us find out who is responsible. What has been our preparedness policy? I have here [exhibiting] quotations from the messages and speeches of the President of the United States, who, down to the end of 1916, continuously voiced a protest against any preparation on the part of this country for war, notwithstanding the fact that all Europe was in conflagration.

Mr. President, I have read the hearings held in the Senate and in the House prior to our entrance into the war; I have read the appeals of Gen. Crozier that we give him even moderate appropriations for artillery and for rifles, and I have seen those appropriations denied when the appropriation bills were presented. During the conflagration in Europe statesmen of this body turned their faces against any preparation and built barbed-wire entanglements around every appropriation, so that this country could not prepare. Our statesmen went over the length and breadth of this land preaching antimilitarism and peace at any price. Read the "Prince of Peace" speech of William Jennings Bryan; read the hearings before the committee; read the statements of the President of the United States.

I remember in my State toward the end of 1916, during the campaign, seeing a great poster on which was portrayed the picture of an aged mother with her hand upon her boy's shoulder, and back of her was a farmhouse around which flowers were growing. The poster was beautifully decorated and illustrated in colors; and at the left-hand side was a picture of the President of the United States, beneath which, in letters as black as jet and as high as one of these desks, were the words "He kept us out of war." My God, at that time every man in this country knew that we would be drawn into the vortex of that great struggle. Now, it is the approaching election that prevents us from protecting the destiny of this country. After the tremendous lesson we have had, when we are staggering under war taxation, I say it is our duty to prepare, and keep this country prepared, so that the interests of our people and their welfare may at all times be defended.

Mr. President, I have heard the answer of the Senator from New York to the Senator from Wisconsin when the Senator from Wisconsin challenged the statement that three or four hundred thousand men might have prevented a further continuance of the war. I say that if in 1916 the continental plan of Secretary Garrison had been adopted, and preparations had been made to carry that plan into effect immediately, it undoubtedly would have had a tremendous influence upon Germany in her resumption of her submarine campaign; and if we had had only two or three hundred thousand men and a proper system of training at the time Germany declared war, if we had joined with the protest of the statesmen of Europe and Earl Grey and those others who were trying to keep the Kaiser from declaring war, the Germans never would have crossed the Belgian line at Liege; and in the early days of 1917, when the German line was crumbling, and when Haig had them almost with their backs to the wall, if we had had a few hundred thousand men ready to send over there, undoubtedly this war would have been shortened by a year and over 2,000,000 lives would have been saved.

This is not a question of compulsory training. It is a question of proper preparedness and training. I am not a lawyer. I have heard the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Wisconsin try to fix the responsibility on a few officers who were compelled to take untrained men. What I am trying to do is to have some men trained; and if we had had some simple preparation of this kind undoubtedly those officers would not have been compelled to send those men in untrained. Their very argument is an argument in favor of this provision.

Mr. President, the trouble with this thing is that men are afraid to stand up and do their duty. I say it is our duty to train our young men in this country, so that we will have a reservoir of men to protect our rights on sea and land. The fear that in the approaching election there will be a revulsion of sentiment in the districts is preventing men now from doing their duty. At a time when this whole country is threatened with revolution, when Europe is in chaos, when the question of national defense and the protection of our traditions of government should be paramount in every man's mind, we are opposing a simple measure of this character for the defense of our Nation.

Economy! If we should to-morrow be compelled to protect the rights of property and human rights, and the lives of our citizens, and call together a million or a million and a half of men, how would the question of twenty-eight or thirty or fifty millions of dollars compare with that? What we should have in this country is the citizens of this country properly prepared to defend the rights of the country, and that is what I am trying to see provided in this bill. I had hoped that there would be no limitation, but that possibly one hundred and fifty, two hundred and fifty, aye, even five hundred thousand men might volunteer in order that they might take this training. I am unwilling to accept a limitation of this character, and I hope the Senate will defeat it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I concur with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] in the hope which he has just expressed that the proposed amendment to the amendment will be defeated, for if we can not have—and it is quite obvious that we can not have—any compulsory system of training we certainly should make provision for a voluntary system of training sufficiently liberal and comprehensive in its character to supplement as far as possible the purpose of the system recommended by the committee, and particularly so when we consider that as regards the overhead charge, the expense to the people, the difference between a voluntary system and no system at all is comparatively negligible.

I think no man who has given any attention to the military history of the war, and particularly since our identification with it, will do otherwise than regret that some more extensive system of training had not been adopted and followed during the interval between the commencement of the war and our entry into it. But the Senator from New Jersey is in error when he unequivocally declares that the administration was opposed to any system of training up to the time we entered the war. I agree with him that the proposed Garrison bill failed to receive the support of the administration. I fully agree that many of us, myself included, were not then sufficiently alive to the need of a thorough system of training, and that the sentiment of the country, both Democratic and Republican, was largely opposed to it. Indeed, it was the policy—if policy it may be called—of the United States to be as unmilitary as possible. We were opposed to a large standing Army. We looked upon too great a National Guard as an expensive luxury, and we hugged to ourselves the fond delusion, announced many years ago by Buckle, that with the increase of trade and the extension of commercial intercourse between the nations the spirit of war would decline and finally disappear. In fact, both the great English-speaking nations of the world have squared their conduct with that policy, whether they believe in it or not; hence it was practically impossible to awaken the people of America from the lethargy of nonpreparation which many years of almost unbroken peace had produced. So that I am not disposed myself to hold any administration, or any particular section of the people, responsible for our military situation.

In view of what the Senator has said, however, I call the attention of the Senate to the position taken by President Wilson upon the subject of training as early as December 8, 1914, on which occasion, in addressing the Congress, he used this language:

> We must depend in every time of national peril, in the future as in the past, not upon a standing Army, nor yet upon a reserve army, but upon a citizenry trained and accustomed to arms. It will be right enough, right American policy based upon our accustomed principles and practices, to provide a system by which every citizen who will volunteer for the training may be made familiar with the use of modern arms, the rudiments of drill and maneuver, and the maintenance and sanitation of camps. We should encourage such training and make it a means of discipline which our young men will learn to value.

Here is the first authoritative utterance of an Executive upon the subject. It is not only an indorsement but a recommendation of a system of voluntary training that would equip the American citizen mentally and physically for the more arduous duties of campaigning in the unfortunate event that hostilities should be declared against any nation. The fact that Congress did not follow it up is not the fault of Mr. Wilson. The fact that no legislation followed the recommendation is our act of omission, not a failure upon his part to advise us. Hence, it is hardly fair to assert without qualification that the Executive, between the period of the commencement of the war and our entry into it, made no recommendation upon the subject, or failed to commit himself to any system, however crude the system may appear to those who believe in the contrary principle of compulsory training.

Mr. President, I read this extract from a letter furnished me by Col. Palmer, a gentleman of whose valuable services we have availed ourselves in the preparation of this bill, an accomplished student of military affairs, an active soldier who saw arduous service in France, and a man who is deeply concerned in the inauguration of such a system for our Army as will reasonably protect us against any and all probable difficulties in the future. He is the same gentleman to whom the chairman of the committee referred some time ago as having contributed so valuably, in conjunction and collaboration with Col. Gulack, toward the preparation of this bill; and, whether it addresses itself ultimately to the favorable consideration of the Senate or not, I want here and now to express my sense of high appreciation, as a member of the committee, of the invaluable services rendered by these two splendid officers to the committee in our efforts to prepare and present to the Senate some intelligent and scientific system of military reconstruction.

Col. Palmer says, following this quotation from the President's message of December 8, 1914:

> The Senate bill as amended, with the voluntary system of training, will establish precisely the system outlined by the President. As the bill stands, young men may take the training without any obligation to enter any organized military force after the training, but they will be given the option, if they so desire, to volunteer either in the Regular Army or the National Guard or the Organized Reserves. Those who enter the Regular Army or the National Guard will voluntarily assume an obligation for military service in time of peace. Those who voluntarily enlist in the Organized Reserves will assume an obligation to serve only in the event of a great emergency especially proclaimed by Congress.
> All of the organizational features provided in the bill still remain. It will still provide an organization for national defense, the only difference being that the necessary organizations would be filled in time of peace under compulsory training, whereas, under voluntary training, they will only be partly filled. But under voluntary training they will include all of the necessary officers and noncommissioned officers and at least part of the necessary private soldiers.
> With voluntary training provided in the bill, it will still be a great preparedness measure, and, in my opinion, will be the best military system that can be devised so long as we are restricted to the voluntary principle. If it should be organized on the voluntary basis, and we should come to compulsory training in the future, we would have all of the necessary organizational arrangements prepared to take care of the young men after such training.

If it be true, and I have no doubt of it, that the proposed voluntary system squares with President Wilson's recommendations of December 8, 1914, then it must follow that we may by this amendment adopt a measure which addressed itself to his favorable consideration almost six years ago, and which I think we should have acted upon then.

It is well to refer to the experiences of the past in determining what our action shall be upon so important a subject, and to glean as many lessons from the experiences of the war as seem to be consistent with its history. But we are too apt, I think, to magnify our deficiencies, to use bitter and extreme expressions of opinion in fixing responsibility, and perhaps too ready to draw conclusions that are only partly sustained by the facts.

I shall not elaborate upon that feature of this discussion, except to say that we have seemed prone ever since this Congress assembled to make charges and countercharges, followed by investigations designed to show that we were not only unprepared for this war, but that during its prosecution and at its close neither our Army nor our Navy had any semblance of efficient organization; that, upon the contrary, they were wholly inadequate to the tremendous duties they were called upon to perform. If we can judge from the investigations of the Navy Department, the American Navy had neither efficiency nor organization. It was a mere phantom. A disinterested listener to these debates would come to the conclusion that our Army was ill-equipped with material, officered by greenhorns, and composed wholly of untrained men.

If that be true, it is to wonder that we won the war. Is it possible that with a Navy that was good for nothing, with an Army that was good for nothing, and with an administration wholly inefficient and indifferent, we contributed mightily to the glorious result, and both our Navy and our Army returned with comparatively small losses, crowned with the triumph of a victory without any parallel in the history of civilization? I sometimes think when I read some of these reports and hear some of these statements that the war must have won itself, that by some automatic method of operation the German army was routed and an armistice altogether favorable to the Allies was secured. What would have been the result if we really had had "a sure enough Army and Navy"?

Oh, Mr. President, these practices are largely belittling. In the brief space of time given to the United States, between the hour when our intervention became a certainty and the glorious 11th day of November, 1918, this Government accomplished more through its Army and its Navy than was ever effected by any other nation in the history of the world. The great, big outstanding fact is that we went into the war and accomplished the object which impelled us to do so, and all the investigations and charges and countercharges in the world can never rob America or this administration of the credit of that stupendous fact, written large upon the pages of history, there to remain, ineffaceable forever.

Mr. President, I earnestly and sincerely hope that the amendment which was adopted last Friday will not be further reduced. I think it is the least that we can do and discharge our duty in making due preparation for a proper Military Establishment. Let us give to the boys of America the opportunity, at least, to come forward on their own account and equip themselves for duties which they must encounter, in all probability, sometime in the future of the Nation. Let us not limit the amount or number, at least until this may be subjected to the experiments of the next three or four years. Let us see whether a beneficial result will be obtained from offering to every young man in the country the opportunity, if he cares to avail himself of it, of enlisting for a system of military training designed for his betterment and advantage, and an essential part of any intelligent system of training, before we further mutilate the proposal by placing upon it a limitation which, in my judgment, would effectively destroy its practical benefit as an operative feature of the bill.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there has been so much unwarranted criticism and disparagement of our wonderful accomplishment in the great World War, I want to take occasion here to read a short statement which I maintain reflects the true conditions so far as the training of our soldiers both individually and in the divisions was concerned. I read from a speech which I made some time since on the participation of America in the World War:

"TRAINING—SOLDIERS—DIVISIONS.

"The average American soldier who went to France received six months' training at home before sailing, and had two months' training overseas before entering the battle line, and then about a month in a quiet sector before going into an active sector and hard fighting, although the experience of thousands of soldiers differ widely from this figure.

"The infantry soldier was trained in the division which was our typical combat unit. In the American Army the division was composed of about a thousand officers and 27,000 men. Training and sorting organizations of 10,000 men, known as depot brigades, were also utilized, but as far as possible the new recruits were put immediately into the divisions which were the organizations in which they would go into action.

"There were trained and sent overseas 42 divisions before the signing of the armistice. The training of 12 more was well advanced and 4 others were being organized at the time. The plans on which the War Department was acting called for 80 divisions overseas before July, 1919, and 100 divisions by the end of that year.

"Of the 42 American divisions which reached France, 36 were organized in the summer and early autumn of 1917. The other 6 were organized as divisions by January, 1918, but had been in training as separate units months before that time. The average division had been organized eight months before sailing for France and its period of training was lengthened by a two months' interim between the time of landing in France and the time it entered the front line. While this is true of skeletons of divisions, it is not true of all the men they finally included since sometimes weeks or months elapsed from the time a division was organized till it reached full strength and troops were frequently taken from one division to fill another which was sailing or to be sent overseas to replace losses. Although the average of two months' training in France before getting into the fighting lines was maintained the experience of divisions used as replacements in the last months was under this figure. The Regular Army divisions show the shortest periods of training, but they were made up of the most experienced soldiers."

I maintain that that reflects the true condition so far as the training of the individual soldier and the soldier in the division were concerned. There has been much unwarranted disparagement here of our past accomplishments, in arguing the necessity for a compulsory military training system.

Mr. President, it has been said that if we had gone into the war a year sooner than we did, if we had been able to put in a compelling force, or a force which would have been equal to the force we did send a year later, we would not have had so many killed. I deny that. If we had put twice as many men into France a year sooner than we did, we would have had four or five times as many killed. The German armies were there; they were fighting; they had to be conquered and overcome; and it could not be done by our armies when they were on the ground without desperate fighting and necessary casualties and loss in killed and wounded.

Why did we not get into the war sooner? Was it because we did not have a trained army? No. We did not get into the war sooner because the Allies and associates with whom we finally joined causes said, "We do not need any men. We need credit, and we need supplies and money. We have plenty of men to whip the Germans."

That was the sort of statement that was made to us. We sent a very few thousand men over at the first. They said, "We do not need any great contingent of men. Just send enough over to show the world that America is with us at heart, and let us have the money and let us have the supplies."

That was the condition. Soon after we got into the war they came with the insistent cry of men and more men, and to send them at once. They said, "We will train them over here." Some were sent under those conditions. But I maintain that the true condition is reflected by what I said in the extract from the speech just read.

Of course, every man who went into the fight had not been trained. That could not be, under the conditions and circumstances. Sometimes replacements which had not received as much training here as should have been given were put into the fight, because they had to have men then; the condition demanded it.

Mr. President, I would call attention to the fact that no great battle has ever yet been fought as it was staged, as it was intended and planned and laid out. It never has been done, and it can not be done. Sometimes one division or sometimes one brigade or sometimes one contingent of soldiers that is not expected to be put into the battle at all must be put in. Sometimes the battle develops hottest on a line where it has not been anticipated it would develop. These conditions must be met as they arise.

Those are some of the things about which there has been much unwarranted criticism here. Compulsory military training, every man knows, will produce the grandest army that has ever been mobilized upon the face of the earth. We know that. The question is whether we shall go into that sort of a system and policy now. I do not believe that the conditions of the country and the world require that it shall be done, and I do not believe that the financial condition of the United States permits of our doing it at this time. We have determined wisely, I think, that it shall not be done.

What ought to be done about the establishment of a voluntary military system? It might be well, and probably ought to be done; but I maintain here and now that the proposal of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] does not show a complete plan for a voluntary training system which would be effective. It has not been worked out along that line. The bill was not drawn with that purpose in view. Will it prove effective if this measure becomes a law? The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has insisted that if a man is brought into the service, or volunteers to take the training, there is no provision of law whereby his services may be utilized after he has been trained. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs now if, under the bill as amended by the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey, there is any provision for inducting these men into the service after their training is finished or putting them into the reserve, where they can be utilized without further legislation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. When the Senate adopted the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey, of course, it took out of the bill the element of compulsion, and men are permitted to volunteer and take a four months' training, and thereafter a man can volunteer and join the National Guard, as they do to-day, or the organized reserves, which are to be organized under this bill. The bill, however, does contain a provision which will result in this: That in the event of a declaration of war by Congress and proclamation by the President, a selective-service law automatically takes effect, and trained men, graduates of these four months' training camps, would be, of course, the greatest assets we would have to recruit such an army.

Mr. KIRBY. They would be available, then, under the provisions of this law, having taken the training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Unfortunately, from my standpoint, of course, they would not be organized. They would be available as individuals.

Mr. KIRBY. As individuals, but not as bodies of troops.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I may say to the Senator, as he undoubtedly knows, that half the time of training an army is taken up in organizing it.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that that is the case, and I understood the bill as it was first presented here provided for a complete system of compulsory military training, but I did not understand, as I said just now, that that could be changed by these mere amendments into a thorough system of voluntary training; and that was the reason why I asked him the question.

I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, if we have a voluntary system that would prove effectual, that would be likely to prove useful, to inaugurating it here, and putting it into force; but if we are going to provide a system that will be practically ineffectual and worthless, I do not see why we should make that kind of a provision. Unless there is a reasonable prospect of putting this system into force and of it being of some advantage hereafter, we ought not to worry about putting it into force and paying the expenses necessary thereto.

So far as I am concerned, it seems to me useless to put 100,000 men in and train them as an experiment; but we know there is no experiment so far as training is concerned. We know we can train a soldier in three months. We trained officers in three months for the last war. We trained officers and soldiers in that time; they won the war against the best trained soldiers and the greatest military machine on the face of the earth. If these men go into training they can get enough training in four months to be proficient in the manual of arms and to be effective soldiers thereafter; and under the circumstances it does not seem to me that there is sufficient binding force in the provisions of the bill to make the system effective as the bill is now drawn.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I intend to detain the Senate but a moment. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has spoken against the limitation suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] is opposed to it, as I happen to know. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is in favor of it. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is opposed to it. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is in favor of it. So that only leaves the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] for me to talk to. The interest manifested in this subject is most inspiring.

I merely want to make one or two references to some of the things that have been said about volunteer training. The Senator from Wisconsin has felt quite certain, as he has said upon many occasions, that the cost of this training is going to be very much larger than the figures submitted by the committee would indicate. He constantly refers to the cantonments as if the cantonments were the only facilities the Government has at its disposal for the training of these men. Of course, the fact is the Government has many other facilities. It has large and commodious seacoast fortifications near great centers of population. It has Army posts of a permanent form and of considerable size, which collectively can take many thousands of men without any material increase in expense by way of construction and without any added burden by way of maintenance. I refer to such forts as Fort Sheridan, near Chicago; the Plattsburg Barracks, in northern New York; the barracks at Fort Ethan Allen. Those posts up there could take care of all northern New England and New York men. Posts like that at the Presidio at San Francisco, posts like that at Fort D. A. Russell—large brigade posts—can take care of all men from the State of Wyoming and perhaps from Idaho and Montana. So we are not encountering the terrific expenses which the Senator from Wisconsin insists upon.

Furthermore, let me repeat that the estimates of the committee to the effect that it would take $283 to train a young man for four months include the cost of the rifles, the cost of the cartridge belts, the cost of the canteen, the cost of the mess kit, and all the soldier's personal equipment. As everybody knows, we have those things on hand now, and it is utterly unfair to charge the value of those things annually against the cost of the training. Two hundred and eighty-three dollars' cost per man for four months is an inflated estimate. It will be much lower than that in actual cost, because it contains the items to which I have just alluded.

I mention this matter of cost because that seems to be the thing that makes Senators fearful about permitting these boys to be trained if they want to be trained. My idea of economy is somewhat different from that of those who have been speaking in opposition to the bill. I believe it is economy to train men. The more men are trained the greater the economy to the country in the long run. There are Senators who do not believe that, or who believe that this matter of economy is only a matter of running over one or two years, perhaps until a certain election can be decided, perhaps for the purpose of making a certain kind of record and going out and preaching about that record. I am trying to look 10, 15, 20, or 30 years hence to see what is economical in the long run. I venture to say that the history of this country shows, without any doubt or question whatsoever, that we would have saved billions of dollars during that history had we had some trained men with which to fight our wars. I fear history some day will repeat itself.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I remember that when the universal military training bill was up in 1916 and hearings were being held by the Military Affairs Committee, a very distinguished officer of the Civil War, Gen. Nelson A. Miles, expressed it as his opinion that it was not necessary to train any men at all, because there were enough men in the United States who had had military training and had gone out of the service to fill all the requirements of any war that might come upon us. Does the Senator know how many men went into this World War who had had military service sufficient to have enabled them to serve in the World War, and who yet were not beyond the age limit for active service?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think there were over 200,000 out of the 4,000,000 who had had any military experience worthy of the name—that is, amongst the enlisted men.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. If the Senator from New York will permit me, I simply wish to remind the Senator from Oregon of the fact that there were only 250,000 volunteers in the Spanish-American War, if that is the war Gen. Miles had reference to. Nearly 20 years elapsed between the time that war closed and the time of our entry into the World War began, and in that period nearly every man who had served in the Spanish-American War had passed the age where he would be accepted by the Government under the restrictions named in the act under which we entered the war. Of course, they were no longer of value in a military sense, except in a very limited number of cases.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator permit me to reply to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I simply want to emphasize that fact. My recollection is as the Senator from New York and as the Senator from Indiana have put it, but there is a general impression throughout the country, amongst people who have not given the subject intimate consideration, that there are enough men who have served in the military arm of the Government who can comply with all the requirements of any kind of a war, and if a man like Gen. Miles, who had gone through the Civil War and served with very great distinction, entertained that opinion, how much more natural is it for men to entertain it who have given the subject only passing consideration.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That reminds me to refer to something which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] mentioned in his remarks a few moments ago, not in criticism of the Senator, but to get one or two little things straightened out. It has to do with a remark the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] made about the number of trained men we had who went into the war.

We speak of the Regular divisions in the war, and when that expression is used the casual hearer gains the impression that all our Regular divisions were composed of what are commonly known as Regular soldiers, and that the Regulars were trained men. As a matter of fact, we had no Regular troops in this war at all, in the usually accepted meaning of the term "Regular." The First Division, that paraded here through Washington, was not composed of Regular troops. It was over 80 per cent drafted men and volunteers, who had enlisted for the emergency only. That same figure, or a greater percentage, would be applicable to every other Regular division which we had, probably greater in all the others, because the First Division managed to gather some of its old Regular soldiers back into it before it came home.

So every one of our divisions were divisions of citizen soldiers in the main. When the First Division went to France in June, 1917, it carried with it 51 per cent, if my recollection is correct, of raw recruits who had enlisted largely for the emergency only. They were not Regulars.

The truth is that a Regular Army, such as we can keep in time of peace, becomes, upon the outbreak of a great war, instantly dissipated and scattered and injected here and there into a vast citizen army, and it loses its identity. The Regular Army can never fight a great war. It did not fight this war. It did not fight the Civil War. Its officers, of course, occupied posts of high responsibility, as they should, because they are the best trained officers. The Regular officers or commissioned personnel of the Regular service is really the only permanent military force we have. The enlisted men come and go, but the commissioned personnel, in a sense, perpetuates itself through the system of graduating them from West Point.

I only mention this to illustrate the fact that a regular army of 200,000 trained men in time of peace is not a drop in the bucket in time of war, and that if we do not have organized back of that army in time of peace some citizen force, reasonably well trained, probably not as well trained as the Regulars, we have not got any army with which to go into war.

Great Britain had exactly the same experience. She had one of the most perfect regular armies the world ever saw. In the first week or 10 days of August, 1914, the British Regular Army moved from England to France and Belgium with clocklike precision, without the slip of a cog, with remarkable discipline and splendid training. In six weeks they had almost ceased to exist. They had simply been wiped practically out of existence by the great armies to which they suddenly found themselves opposed.

Again, referring to this amendment, I hope that no limitation will be placed upon the number of men who may be trained. I can appreciate, however, the thought that is in the mind of the Senator from Wisconsin. He apparently feared the cost in that the bill as now amended provides that men between the ages of 18 and 28 shall be eligible for this training in an unlimited number. Would the Senator consider the suggestion that instead of limiting the number who may be trained in any one year we limit the ages?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator consider withdrawing his amendment if we fix the ages at 18 and 21?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And then permit any boy between the ages of 18 and 21 to be trained as a matter of right, provided, of course, he is physically and mentally fit?

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator desires to modify the provision, cutting off seven years during which boys and young men will be eligible to training, I shall be glad to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The ages of 18 to 21 were the ages originally fixed in the bill; and what I am particularly anxious for is that, whatever minimum and maximum age we shall set, every young man in the United States between that maximum and minimum shall have the right to be trained. To my mind it has always been a question of right; a young man ought to have that opportunity. If that would meet the Senator's objection as well as his amendment, so far as I am concerned, I had rather do it in that way.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will offer such an amendment as he suggests, I will withdraw, if I may, the pending amendment until his amendment shall have been disposed of fixing the age limit.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if we turn to page 65 of the bill, line 9, we shall find that amongst the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] the word "three," before the word "years," was stricken out and the word "ten" was inserted. It was that amendment which had the effect of raising the maximum age limit to 28 instead of 21 years. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which that amendment was adopted be reconsidered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, having introduced the amendment referred to by the Senator from New York, I shall not object to that change, in view of the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The vote whereby the amendment was agreed to having been reconsidered, I hope the amendment will now be rejected. It is the amendment proposing to strike out "three" and insert "ten."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, as I understand, the RECORD shows that my amendment is withdrawn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer certain amendments in reference to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I send to the desk an amendment to the amendment which I offered on Friday, which I ask that the Secretary may read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the proposed amendment is in lieu of the amendment previously offered by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The READING CLERK. In lieu of the amendment heretofore proposed by Mr. McKELLAR it is proposed to insert the following:

Beginning on page 65, line 4, strike out all of sections 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 58, 59, 60, 65, 71, and 76, as amended, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"In addition to military training, soldiers while in active service shall hereafter be required to study and receive instruction of not less than three hours in any scholastic week of five days during eight months in the year upon educational lines of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations.

"Each Army post or cantonment, and, as far as possible, not less than one shall be designated in each State, is hereby directed to be utilized as a training center for the education of such soldiers as may be assigned to duty there, and the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall prescribe such rules and regulations for conducting the instruction herein provided for, to the end that when a soldier completes his term of enlistment he may be given a certificate of graduation in those schools in which he has been found proficient at the same time that he is given his discharge or his furlough to the reserves.

"In pursuance of this plan the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to divide the enlisted men of the Army, hereby fixed at 300,000 men, into three general classes or divisions, so that one-third of the Army may be graduated and discharged each year and new recruits not exceeding 100,000 men may be entered as a new class each year. As soldiers are graduated and discharged they shall be furloughed into the reserves, and shall be subject to call in the event of an emergency during a period of five years. Any officer of the Army qualified to give instruction in any line, or any qualified noncommissioned officer, may be designated by the Secretary of War as a teacher or professor in any school or post to which he may be assigned. Civilian teachers may be employed to aid the Army officers in giving such instruction, and part of this instruction may consist of vocational education, either in agriculture or in the mechanic arts.

"Each soldier shall have the right to elect what course of instruction he will take under the rules and regulations to be established as aforesaid. The General Staff shall have, under the direction of the Secretary of War, general supervision over the conduct of the schools and courses of study provided for under this act."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Senator proceeds with the discussion of his amendment, I should like to ask him a question. As I understand, the amendment provides for compulsory education among the soldiers in the Army?

Mr. McKELLAR. In the Regular Army.

Mr. HARRISON. And it changes the law to that extent. Heretofore it has been voluntary and the amendment proposes to make it compulsory.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is correct in the main about it.

Mr. HARRISON. So that the Senator may discuss the proposition, I propose to offer an amendment to the amendment, and, if he will allow me, I will offer it now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well, let it be offered now.

Mr. HARRISON. At the beginning of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee I move to strike out the words "be required," and to insert the words "be given the opportunity."

Mr. McKELLAR. The words referred to occur in the second or third line, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the Senator from Mississippi merely desires to offer the amendment and have it pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be considered as pending.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee would reenact in a modified way the law as it now stands. In the national defense act of June 3, 1916, there is found the following provision, being a part of section 27 of that act:

In addition to military training, soldiers while in the active service shall hereafter be given the opportunity to study and receive instruction upon educational lines of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations. Civilian teachers may be employed to aid the Army officers in giving such instruction, and part of this instruction may consist of vocational education either in agriculture or the mechanic arts. The Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall prescribe rules and regulations for conducting the instruction herein provided for, and the Secretary of War shall have the power at all times to suspend, increase, or decrease the amount of such instruction offered as may, in his judgment, be consistent with the requirements of military instruction and service of the soldiers.

Mr. President, a short time after that provision was enacted into law the United States entered the World War, and that naturally interfered, in fact practically prevented, the carrying out at that time of this voluntary scheme. Since the armistice was signed and our troops have returned provisions have been made for the carrying out of that requirement of existing law, and I find that in an army of 211,000 on October 31, 1919, there were 27,132 men in the Army who were receiving the benefits of this voluntary educational training. I have found, however, that it is attended with many difficulties which I will point out in a few moments.

The purpose of this amendment is to give the young men who enlist in our Army a strictly first-class education. We know perfectly well that under present circumstances and under the present law young men drift into the Army, young men who probably have not anything else to do enlist in the Army, and various other kinds of young men get into the Army who are more concerned about their then present situation than they are about improving themselves for the future. The purpose of this amendment is to change that situation.

I am indebted for much of what I am going to say and for many of the views I am going to express upon this subject to a young but distinguished Army officer of very considerable rank, who has served in almost all capacities from private soldier up to his present rank.

The idea that men in the Army should be trained only for drill and in the use of weapons is obsolete. We have progressed beyond that. The Senators who are in favor of compulsory training think that if young men are trained in the Army for three months that will make them good soldiers for all time. Under present conditions that is no longer a correct proposition, but obsolete idea referred to has made service in the Army unpopular and practically fitted only for those who can not succeed in civil life; it has made recruiting difficult and costly. The sums which we expend in recruiting young men for the Army to-day are enormous. It is difficult to get them; it has made people believe that peace service in the Army is time wasted amidst slothful influences. We all know that that is correct. The mere idea of compulsory education in the Army makes the service the alma mater of soldiers; it extends education to those who can not otherwise afford it; it makes parents willing to enlist their sons; it makes peace service in the Army a useful and necessary period in a man's life, of great economic value, and gains for it the respect of all people.

Arguments in favor of compulsory education in the Army may be grouped under three general heads:

A. Benefit to the Army.

(1) The addition of compulsory education to physical training will practically solve the recruiting problem.

(2) Changes in modern system of waging war require brain as well as brawn.

(3) The Army will become the great university of the common people, the alma mater of the honorably discharged soldiers, perhaps in most instances the only college of which the ambitious sons of the poor can have the advantage.

B. Benefit to the soldier:

(1) It provides him with weapons for battles of civil life upon his leaving the service.

(2) It gives him the self-respect which only knowledge brings.

(3) It is practical and completes his physical training, making him a well-rounded citizen.

C. Benefit to the country:

(1) In a Government like ours, where every citizen can express his opinion at the ballot box, lack of education is one of the most dangerous afflictions.

(2) Proper education of our citizens is the most powerful weapon against bolshevism.

(3) Education means an understanding of our institutions. If a soldier is educated, he will in turn take care that his children are educated.

Under a system of voluntary enlistment it solves the recruiting problem, gains better material for the Army and provides material for the making of officers and noncommissioned officers.

Compulsory education gives the Army a personnel better suited for its advancement in these times, when science is responsible for military achievement.

It is practical. The soldier has plenty of time for it, and it can go hand in hand with his military and physical training.

It will help materially to stamp out illiteracy in our country. Right there, when we recall that we have over 8,500,000 illiterates in this country, surely we ought to take advantage of this opportunity to train the young men as they go into our Army. We spend these vast sums, hundreds of millions of dollars, on our Army. Surely we ought to utilize that money in part in making these boys better citizens when they come out of the Army.

The present system of schools in the Army is inadequate; and, by the way, I want to say that they are doing a splendid work, Mr. President. Many of the Army officers have taken an active interest in the matter, and they are doing a most excellent work; they ought to be aided, and they ought to be aided by a better and a more effective system.

The present system of schools in the Army is inadequate for three reasons: (1) Shortage of officers and the intensive course of instruction mapped out for officers does not permit a sufficient number to be detailed for instructing in khaki schools. (2) Lack of qualified instructors in technical branches; for example, laymen attempting to teach motor mechanics, and the president of the college not a man of experience in educational matters. (3) Lack of attendance by the men.

It has too long been the thought of our people that, except during a war, our Army was but an asylum for the unemployed, and that the time spent by a man in the military service was utterly wasted to him as a citizen and even detrimental thereto.

How often we have heard that statement—that you put a young man in the Army, and he came out of it a worse man than when he went in; but if you put him in the Army and give him an excellent education, better than many of our smaller colleges afford, even, it will build him up. It will make a man out of him; it will make a good citizen and a good American out of him. In the past, as everyone knows, this idea has caused some contempt and prejudice against the uniform among the civil population. Later years, capped by the experience of our great Army in the late war, have wrought great changes in the public mind as to what the Army should and does now stand for as an institution beneficial to our own national progress. To the public mind, in a democratic Republic like ours, simon-pure militarism is abhorrent and is only tolerated as a necessary evil when the country is actually faced with war. When peace comes again all are anxious to disarm and rid ourselves of all signs of militarism as rapidly as possible. The best thinkers in the country know that in these times we are in no sense isolated by the oceans that wash our shores, and that while Europe and the Orient are armed camps it is fatal to a country like ours to be unprepared for war.

Compulsory military training in time of peace is un-American and will never be tolerated by the American people. The maintenance of a Regular Army of adequate size and a citizen reserve is, however, a safeguard with which we can not prudently dispense. This must be done by voluntary enlistments, and experience has taught us that in time of peace service in the Army is not favorably thought of by the people generally and is attractive in the main only to those who lack the ambition and self-confidence so necessary to success in civil life.

If educating a man to succeed afterwards in civil life were made a compulsory part of Army training there would be no difficulty in recruiting the Army from the best material in the land. Instead of looking upon Army service as a bad influence and a ne'er-do-well's refuge, parents would vie with each other to secure places for their sons upon the Army rolls. It would mean to them that their sons would be sent to a school where the character-forming influences were sure to make them patriotic and self-reliant citizens, where they could by election choose their vocation and be efficiently trained for its pursuit in civil life. It would bring these unparalleled advantages within the reach of all up to the authorized strength of the Army.

When the soldiers of America become the scholars of the Nation the safety of our institutions will be guaranteed by the irresistible force of intelligence actuated by patriotism.

At present service in the Army in time of peace means so many years wasted from a man's career as a citizen. If, on the contrary, it meant to him a free education along academic and vocational lines it would lift the service in the minds of our people to the high educational plane where the requirements of modern warfare have of necessity placed it and would be a godsend to our young men who lack the financial assurance of an education so necessary to every man of to-day.

Mr. President, I may say here that as I recall my own experience in early life I would have given anything to have enlisted in an army under an educational scheme like this and secured my education in that way, and there are thousands, nay, hundreds of thousands of young men all over our country, and especially in the rural districts of our country, who would be glad to join the Army if thereby they could get a strictly first-class education that would fit them for civil pursuits during all their lives to come.

An educated citizen is a credit to a nation, while every illiterate is a debit. A trained mind is an asset; an idle brain is a liability. The strength of a nation is now measured by the state of education of its people. Not only does the modern soldier fight far more with his head than with his hands, but our welfare and prosperity in war and in peace depends upon the intelligence of our vast industrial army.

By making liberal education a necessary part of Army training, the Government would be making useful citizens by the same effort that maintains our martial strength, and the Army uniform would be looked upon more with the respect that surrounds the cap and gown than as the livery of the unemployed. There are many men who think that the boys in our Regular Army have little or nothing to do except the usual chores around an Army camp.

Many States have laws compelling all native-born children to attend school, and the benefits of such laws in the reduction of illiteracy and in augmenting economic efficiency can not be questioned as overestimated. When the mother can send her boy to the Army, and feel that when he has finished his service there he has received an education, even learned a profession or trade, and at the same time qualified himself as a soldier to defend his country in time of need, then will we have taken a most important step toward perfection in enlightened democratic government.

The advantages to accrue from compulsory education in the Army may be grouped under three general headings: First, the benefits to the Army; second, the benefits to the soldiers; and last, the benefits to the country. Modern methods of waging war require more than ever before warriors with imagination and with trained intellects. In the second place, education will prove of the same value to the soldier as to persons in other walks of life. Last, but by no means least, comes the benefit that will accrue to the country; for the real purpose of our Army is to protect our country, and in the ranks of an Army of a democracy there is no place for illiterates. Physical strength will not alone suffice, and brawn can not take the place of brain in the operation of the complicated engines of death of this advanced age.

Pope said in one of his poems: "A little learning is a dangerous thing." He might well have added: "But abysmal ignorance is more dangerous still," for ignorance is the canker which gnaws at the heart of a republic, and an enlightened citizenry is the most powerful bulwark of a free State.

Generally speaking, four classes of men were attracted into the old army who could have been helped: (1) Failures; (2) men without ambition, seeking the easiest way; (3) the uneducated, or those of little education; and (4) men, usually in a rut, who could not forge ahead in the competitive struggle of civil life. That there were good men and true in the old army, no one knowing the facts can deny; but what was done for them? What advantages of self-culture or education were placed within their reach? What incentive was offered them to improve their minds?

Compulsory education will not prove a panacea for all the ills to which our Military Establishment is heir; but under a sensible system of compulsory education in the Army, there should be attracted to its ranks those who enlisted under the old régime and others who would add to the effectiveness of the Army and who could in turn be substantially assisted. As the standards of its soldiers are raised through education, it will be regarded as a lasting honor to wear the uniform, and the youth of the country can be safely encouraged to enter the ranks. Families of small means and many children will look forward to the day of enlistment of the boys as the date of their matriculation in the khaki university; and their training will not, as now, depend upon chance benefactions for completion and leave them unprepared for the battles of civil life. Many a boy to whom otherwise the doors of knowledge would be forever barred will walk through the door of a recruiting office into the realm of knowledge.

Education fosters ambition and wakes dormant and unsuspected talents. Coming back to civil life after an intensive course of study in the Army, a soldier meets men of his age on the same level. He may reenlist in the desire for further advancement, but he is not compelled to reenlist because he is cold or hungry or lonely. He goes back, not as to a haven of the slothful or the unambitious, but as the thirsty man who has tasted of the cup of knowledge and found it good.

In the National Army there were thousands of men to whom the language of their adopted country was a sealed book; and many a soldier of this Republic lies buried in the fields of France who prayed his last prayer in an alien tongue.

Awhile ago I said that war is now a thing of brain as well as brawn. One of the most deadly weapons of the late war was a chemical preparation evolved by a trained mind—I refer to gas—and protection against it was the work of intellect and not of the hands. Airships were constructed not so much by brute strength as in the knowledge of natural and physical laws, and the swiftly gliding zeppelins were first completed in the imagination of an educated man.

Not that we desire the creation of more deadly weapons for the destruction of mankind. It is not for such purposes that we would educate our soldiers. But peace has problems just as deadly and as difficult to overcome as the engines of war, and we have not done our duty toward the soldier who goes back to civil life unless we have furnished him with the one weapon of defense which he most needs—an education.

How does the ordinary soldier spend his day? I call the particular attention of Senators to this before they vote on this amendment. This is from a man who was a soldier. Of course, a large number—27,351, as the records show—are now attending the schools provided at a few camps, but attendance at these schools is voluntary. Let us look at the daily life of a soldier who does not attend schools.

He rises at 6 o'clock. Tidying up his bunk, he makes his toilet and eats breakfast. After breakfast he "polices up" around his quarters or barracks and is given military instruction usually throughout the forenoon. At noon he eats dinner. After dinner, unless he is given some duty involving physical exertion, he finds his time heavy on his hands and must repair to the canteen or to the poolroom for amusement. Without education the great world of literature provided at every camp library can not attract him. The afternoon gone, he eats supper at 5 o'clock and usually loafs until his bedtime.

The young man between 18 and 25 has no hours to loaf. He must have hours for play, and I would be the last one to curtail the time necessary for recreation of mind and body. Recreation, in truth, it is; but idle loafing will not recreate lost tissues or stimulate tired nerves.

Soldiers are human beings. They are not simply forms composed of flesh and bone to be moved about and sacrificed as men on a chessboard. When sacrifices are necessary they are always ready, but in the meantime if given the opportunity they will anxiously embrace all educational advantages. Education has been the greatest boon to the human race since the beginning of time. We of the United States have provided means whereby any person may obtain an education. Why have we been so anxious about this? Why did we, as soon as we undertook to govern the Philippines and Cuba, at once organize extensive school systems? Because to-day education is the heritage due all humans and one of the greatest obligations of a nation to its citizens. Because the returns to the nation are many times over worth the cost.

To date we have exacted every sacrifice from the soldier. We have taken him into the Army and endeavored to develop him into a perfect physical specimen, so he could the better fight for us. At all times we have had in mind the making of a fighting machine that would win battles for us. The day, however, is here when our soldier must be more than a fighting machine of bone and muscle. Education in the Army is in the ascendency, and while the Nation will get the real benefits from education, the men will incidentally benefit in many ways.

Take the life of a soldier as lived to-day. He becomes one of the Army. He need not know how to speak, read, or write the English language, and even if he can he is associated with many who can not. He is carefully drilled for the purpose of making him a disciplined soldier and making his body strong and healthy. After we have done this we selfishly stop and give nothing in return, and when the soldier leaves the service he takes nothing with him but his well-developed body. The great talents that these men possess are allowed to lie dormant, and of course atrophy. During peace time the soldier has a great deal of leisure time and we have been content that he should spend this time undirected.

Now, what would be the outlook to an enlisted man under compulsory education. First of all, we would make our soldiers Americans in fact as well as in name. They would all speak, read, and write our language. They would know the history and meaning of our institutions. Our drill would not be confined to the training of the body, but would also include training of the mind. Give the men a taste of education and they will grow ambitious to excel and fit themselves for the specialized work in the new branches of a modern Army that require highly trained and educated men.

A most important factor to be considered is the return of soldiers to civilian life. Under compulsory education we will have made them 100 per cent American and equipped them mentally to compete with those who have not rendered service to the flag. Given educational advantages, a man improves. Denied such advantages, he falls behind. From a selfish standpoint it is a wise policy for us to educate our soldiers in order to make them better soldiers and leaders in the industrial life of this country upon release from the Army.

Mr. President, I have been in one or the other branches of Congress for a period now of more than eight years. I have voted for every educational measure that has come up in either House while I was there, some of them good and some of them not so good. But I take no chances. With 8,500,000 illiterates in this country who ought to be educated, I believe it is the duty of every public servant who has anything to say about it to give the young men of this country a better education than they are now receiving, whenever it is possible.

The first bill I ever introduced in the House was a bill which provided for military training and for education at the same time. I believe in it. We have now the opportunity to enact it. We enacted four years ago a voluntary system, working fairly well in a small degree. But what we need is a compulsory system, for these young men have the time, and it is our duty to look after their time, and it is our duty to give them the benefits which the expenditure of these vast sums permits us to give to them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. With pleasure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to ask the Senator, if he believes it is a good plan to compel an uncertain number of young men who may volunteer in the service to take an education, why it is not a good plan to absolutely wipe out illiteracy by compelling every young man of a certain age to go into the service and then to compel him to take an education, because in one or two years at least you would have all the young men in the country taking an education?

Mr. McKELLAR. For this reason, Mr. President: When a young man volunteers, as provided here, to go into the Army, then, as it seems to me, we have the right to say what we shall do with him, and how we shall control his time, and how we shall train him after he gets there, and to that extent I am for whatever is necessary to make that man a better soldier and a better man after he has volunteered to go into the Army. But I say that in peace times it is undemocratic, that it is contrary to American institutions, contrary to American traditions and to every phase of American policy we know anything about, to conscript the young men and put them in the Army when they come of a certain age. I say that it is not only contrary to our institutions but that it has proven bad in the past. There is no nation which has ever had universal compulsory military training which has not come to grief. Take Germany. It flourished there as in no other place, and yet we see Germany, the greatest military nation in the world and with universal compulsory training for more than a hundred years, humbled and broken by the young men of America, who had the spirit to fight. I say that I am unwilling to change this American system, which built up in the young man a spirit to fight for his country when it is necessary, for the worn-out system of Germany, which has been found a colossal failure to the German nation.

Why should we change? We have just won the greatest war ever fought among men. We won it by training young men under our American ideals and American institutions and American traditions and American history, and we succeeded. They overcame the great trained armies of Germany, trained under universal military instruction. Why should we swap the successful system we have for the impotent and defeated system of Germany? I say that we should not do it. I say that when the young man enlists in the Army we have a right to train him as we see fit, and I believe we should train his mind as well as his body, because we know he will make a better soldier. But I would not force him in times of peace to go into any army, whether he would or not.

Mr. President, before I close I want to say a word or two about this voluntary system. We all know what this voluntary system is. There is no use for us to fool ourselves a moment about it. Last Friday the Senate of the United States voted down universal compulsory military training, and there were only nine Senators in this body who voted for it. Why is the voluntary system proposed? In the hope that some future Congress may graft the compulsory system on it. The bill as amended is exactly the same as when reported, except for the word "compulsory." All the machinery, all the paraphernalia, all the casts, are just the same, provided we get as many men under it. It is just made voluntary instead of compulsory, in the hope, of course, that some future Congress will make it compulsory. I pray to God that no future Congress will make it compulsory. We know we can get these young men, and we know we can train them. Under the magnificent management of Gen. Crowder the draft system in the war worked wonders in this country, and it will work them again, if you just keep the young men out of compulsory training, and keep them with the spirit to fight.

As to this voluntary system, I want to quote for a moment a statement of one of its friends. In season and out of season the Washington Post has fought for compulsory military training. It fought for it when the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] a few years ago introduced a bill providing for it. It has fought for it all the time ever since, and here is what it says in an editorial entitled "A great step backward":

Universal military training, a policy of necessity for the adequate defense of the Nation, is dead, a sacrifice upon the altar of political expediency. Events of the last three years have proved that had this policy been in effect at the outbreak of the war thousands of lives and millions of treasure would have been saved by obviating much of the delay caused by training the citizen army in readiness for field service. The men who had the largest part in America's war activities recommend it as the only safe and prudent measure of preparedness which will meet the possible exigencies of the future. The wisest statesmen recognize that in this policy lies the best insurance against future wars, since a nation prepared is least likely to be attacked.

But universal training is dead, killed by the politicians who are terrified at the threats of voters in some States to turn the Republicans out of Congress if they enact such a law. These voters are more concerned about the spring plowing and the harvest of the crops than about the national defense. They are short-sighted Americans, who hide their personal interests behind a pretended fear of militarism.

Senate leaders, real Americans of both parties intent only upon building up a national defense to meet any possible situation which may arise, now sorrowfully admit their failure. While universal military training lies dormant in the House, the Senate has endeavored to secure favorable action on it, but it is now apparent that the bill can not be put through at this session.

A compromise is proposed, by which "compulsory" training would be wiped out and "voluntary" training substituted. But what would "voluntary" military training mean if put into effect? It would mean that the patriotic young men of the United States, those with red blood in their veins and the spirit of liberty in their souls, would take advantage of the opportunity to prepare themselves for shouldering the responsibilities of citizenship if this Government should be threatened. They would attend the encampments, learn the rudiments of soldiering, and be ready to leap to the colors upon call.

The "other kind" of young men would not.

Should war clouds appear upon the horizon, the Nation would look to the youths who are prepared for service to make up the first line of defense. Being ready, both in training and in spirit, they naturally would be the first to be called. And while the "other kind" were going through the delays of the draft and training the patriots would be facing the enemy. Thus the "voluntary" compromise would reward and protect slackers and punish patriots.

It is bad enough that Congress should abandon the great policy of preparedness under the threat of political retaliation. But it would be craven to consent to adopt a "voluntary" plan which would lift the responsibility of American citizenship from the shoulders of some boys and add it to the backs of others.

Mr. President, there is much in that editorial that I do not agree with. On the other hand, it affords a strong argument why we should not go into voluntary training—the cost of it at this time, the doubt about what will be accomplished under it, the building up of great machinery to look after at this time when our country is already overburdened with debt. The cost might possibly amount, as some one suggested to-day, to $700,000,000 or $800,000,000. It would take only about 20 years of that kind of expenditure to cost more than all the World War has cost the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator state which Senator has suggested that the voluntary training would cost seven or eight hundred million dollars?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the appropriation for the entire Army would cost about $800,000,000, some one suggested.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator was referring to voluntary military training when he made that remark.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The RECORD will show it, unless the Senator changes the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not intend it that way. If I did say so, I want to correct that statement, because I did not intend it that way. The appropriations for the Military Establishment are somewhere in the neighborhood of $800,000,000, and I think will be much more than that if we pass this bill as it is. The figures I have given I think are correct.

However that may be, here is what is proposed. Who can say what it will cost? No one knows. Who can say what kind of men will be obtained for this voluntary army? No one knows. Who can say how many will come from one State or another? Who can say how much we ought to appropriate for? No one knows and no one can tell. It is a visionary scheme a little larger than Plattsburg and vastly more costly, perhaps.

As to the provision that I propose in lieu of it, we will know exactly what we are going to do. We are going to train 300,000 men and keep them training all the time and moving along one after another. Every year we will add another 100,000, and in five years, in general terms, of course, not exactly that many, because many of them will die and many will be made ineffective for service, but there will be between 400,000 and 500,000 men, not trained for three months, not trained simply to shoulder a musket and keep step, but 400,000 or 500,000 men who are well trained, well educated, capable of defending their country, capable of making good citizens when their country needs no defense.

It seems to me we should adopt this kind of a system, that is concrete, so we may know exactly what we are going to get for our money. There can be no doubt about it. The money will be well expended, regardless of training, either way. To my mind, we can not adopt a better system. As I recall it, the Senator from New York the other day, when the matter was mentioned in a running debate on the floor, expressed his approval of some such plan of compulsory education in the Regular Army. The Senator shakes his head and I suppose he did not. I hope the Senator will come to a different conclusion about it, because the sooner we come to it the stronger and better Army we will have and the better citizens we will make. Instead of young men looking down upon the Army and service in the Regular Army, it will be regarded as a badge of honor to have served in the Army and to have graduated from its school.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask the attention of Senators to some of the provisions of this amendment. In the first place, it says "beginning on page 65, line 4, strike out all of sections 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 58, 59, 60, 65, 71, and 76." Roughly speaking, those are the sections which provide for the training now made voluntary under the bill. All training, of course, is to be for young men between the ages of 18 and 21, anyone who may present himself and receive it. The Senator from Tennessee offers as a substitute for all that something of an entirely different character, applicable only to the small Regular Army.

Then for some reason the Senator from Tennessee proposes to repeal section 71. Section 71 is the section of the bill that provides for pay for the National Guard. What the Senator has against the National Guard I do not know, but he repeals it, or is attempting to do so.

In adddition to that he repeals section 76, which has already been repealed, and before it was repealed its only effect was to provide for the method——

Mr. McKELLAR. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment. I decline to be interrupted now.

Its only effect before it was repealed was to provide for the admission of cadets to West Point. Why he wants to repeal it a second time, when it was not necessary in the first instance, I do not know.

Again, in the third paragraph of the amendment, which was prepared, I see, with remarkable care, the Senator from Tennessee provides that the strength of the enlisted men in the Army is "hereby fixed at 300,000 men." That is in direct conflict with section 12 of the bill, in which we fixed the strength of the Army at 280,000 men. The Senator does not make any amendment of section 12, but merely, in some mysterious way, by inserting in another part of the bill a brand new section, affecting only the permanent personnel, the Regulars only, many pages separated from anything to do with the Regulars, he proceeds to put in a contradictory section.

As to this scheme for 300,000 enlisted men in the Army, to be divided according to his amendment into three general classes or divisions, so that one-third of the Army may be graduated and discharged each year, the Senator probably forgets that if he does that he will not permit any man to serve as an enlisted man in the Army for more than three years. That would necessitate the discharge immediately upon the passage of any such legislation of practically sergeants in the Army, who have all been in over three years, and who, under the Senator's amendment, can not stay more than three years, for in the future, he says, the whole 300,000 men shall be divided into three classes, one of which shall graduate from the Army each year. Men of 20, 25, or 30 years of faithful service, splendid old noncommissioned officers, will be a thing of the past if the Senator from Tennessee has his way. Never again will we have that splendid type of old veteran noncommissioned officers in the Army if his amendment should be agreed to.

I suppose the Senator means that. He has worked very hard on many such amendments to the bill, and I have to take the amendments as he suggests them. That is the effect. The provision is in direct conflict with the section of the bill which he does not attempt to amend, and we will never in the days to come have anything like the old sergeants and first sergeants and quartermaster sergeants of the Regular service, because no one, under his proposed amendment, can stay in the Regular service over three years.

The bill carries a reenactment of the present law providing for vocational and educational work in the Army. It is true it is voluntary, just as the Senator from Tennessee apparently would prefer it. It is in the bill now reenacted from the national-defense act. The Senator from Tennessee, I assume from his amendment, endeavors to make it compulsory. That must be based upon the conclusion that no one goes into the Regular Army save uneducated men, which I think is somewhat of a slur upon the enlisted strength of the Regular Army. Quite a number of men go into the Regular Army, voluntarily of course, who do not need this education. Why should they be compelled to take it if that is the case?

The Senator from Tennessee makes a proposal under which every man who enlists in the Army must spend three hours a day on five days in the week throughout his entire length of service in this educational work; he must do it. Well, if he is hiking after marauding bands in the mountains of the Philippine Islands, I do not know how he is going to do it. If he is out on active service patrolling the border week after week, day after day, I do not know how we are going to say that that man must spend three hours every day studying arithmetic. That is what the Senator from Tennessee asks the Senate to do.

I really think the Senator has been handed something by his young officer friend. Apparently he has urged the Senator to introduce this amendment, because he said that in the first instance.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from New York declined to yield, but surely he does not want to misrepresent me. I got from him the material on which I spoke a while ago, but this amendment is my own amendment. It is fashioned after the amendment that I prepared and which is now a part of the national-defense act of 1916. That amendment, or the compulsory feature of it, was stricken out by the House or the Senate, I have forgotten which, in 1915. I offered a similar amendment to the House bill in 1915, as I recall. That is where it comes from, and the little deficiencies that the Senator speaks of do not interfere in the slightest particular with the principle.

Mr. WADSWORTH. One of those little deficiencies wrecks the National Guard. I do not know what the Senator wanted to do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, in some way section 71 happens to be in that amendment. I do not recall how it go there, and it is not the intention, of course, to offer a provision that will strike that out. I am going to perfect my amendment by striking it out. I am much obliged to the Senator for calling it to my attention. Those things will happen. If that is the only trouble with it——

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a lot more than that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to agree to every suggestion the Senator makes upon it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a lot more than that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I am willing——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yielded for a question only. There are lots more troubles about this in addition to the ones I have mentioned.

In spite of the avalanche of abuse in which the Senator from Tennessee has been inclined to indulge with reference to the General Staff of the Army, I notice that this amendment of his puts all the educational work of the Army under the much-hated General Staff.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to give them something to do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In other words, we are going to militarize education?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; to that extent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, that is the complete extent. The General Staff is composed solely of officers of the Army, and here it is proposed to establish an educational system in the Army and put it solely under soldiers. That, of course, is in direct conflict with several other provisions of the bill which define the duties of the General Staff. The Senator from Tennessee does not attempt to amend those provisions. As a matter of fact, Mr. President—and I say it advisedly—the amendment as offered here to-day indicates that the Senator from Tennessee has not yet read our bill from beginning to end. The amendment would not have been offered had he done so. It indicates that he does not understand the structure of our bill at all, even though it has been reported from a committee of which he is a member.

The amendment is not competent as it is drawn, and I think the Senator from Tennessee knows it. It would make instead of a consecutive piece of legislation, as recited between its first and the last pages, a hopeless mess of the whole thing if it were adopted.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield, I desire to say that I think the Senator's entire bill is a hopeless mess.

Mr. WADSWORTH. At least it is a consistent mess.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it is very inconsistent, painfully inconsistent, and that the Senator himself does not understand it, as he has frequently shown on the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, Mr. President, I think if I were offering an amendment to the bill, I would know what sections to strike out, which the Senator from Tennessee apparently does not know. He also proposes to change the term of enlistment of the entire Regular Army by the addition of a reserve clause. His amendment provides:

As soldiers are graduated and discharged they shall be furloughed—

How can a soldier be discharged and furloughed at the same time? The amendment provides:

As soldiers are graduated and discharged they shall be furloughed into the reserves.

There are not any reserves, Mr. President, which are applicable to the Regular Army; and that is the only thing which the Senator from Tennessee touches. The amendment reads:

They shall be furloughed into the reserves, and shall be subject to call in the event of an emergency during a period of five years.

An emergency declared by whom—by the President or by the Congress or by both? The language is incomplete. The terms of enlistment of the whole force are changed, and no man can do more than three years of active service in the Regular Army. Even if he should want to reenlist, he must be discharged and then furloughed, whatever that may mean.

Mr. President, I have simply offered this as an example of the studious care which the Senator from Tennessee has shown in examining the bill and to indicate to the Senate that if his amendment were adopted in anything like its present form it would not be operative in any degree. I hope we shall not establish the theory of compulsory education in the Army as a condition to enlistment. I fear we would not get any recruits.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. As I understand, the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], providing for voluntary training, does not repeal the present law which is carried in the national-defense act, touching the training of soldiers along educational lines?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. HARRISON. But if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] should be adopted, it would repeal that law, because it would make such training compulsory.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would make it compulsory and go much further.

Mr. HARRISON. Whereas the other is voluntary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would go much further and change the entire enlistment contract.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I take it that if there should be any probability of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee being adopted, the Senator from New York would prefer an amendment such as I have offered, to make such education voluntary rather than compulsory?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; of course. But that is already in the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to read an amendment which has been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. But if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee should be adopted, the amendment to which the Senator from New York refers would not be in the bill, and the present law on the subject would be repealed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Tennessee has not proposed to amend the amendment which has already been adopted. That is another thing, Mr. President. One of the amendments, adopted upon the third day the bill was under consideration, and known as subdivision (f) of the miscellaneous provisions at the end of the bill, provides:

(f) In addition to military training, the enlisted men of the permanent personnel shall hereafter be given an opportunity to study and receive instruction of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations. Civilian teachers may be employed to aid the Army officers in giving such instruction, and part of this instruction may consist of vocational education either in agriculture or the mechanic arts. The Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall prescribe rules and regulations for conducting the instruction herein provided for, and the Secretary of War shall have the power at all times to suspend, increase, or decrease the amount of such instruction offered as may, in his judgment, be consistent with the requirements of military instruction and service.

Of course, it depends upon what kind of duty troops are serving on. On some kinds of duty they can spend more hours per day in educational studies than they can when serving upon other kinds of duty. There has to be left elasticity in such legislation. The Senator from Tennessee desires to make the time no less than three hours every day, and to make it compulsory. I think that the Senator from Mississippi and myself rather agree upon that side of the question. The provision which I have read, however, is already in the bill, and the Senator from Tennessee has not offered to amend it or to strike it out at all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator from New York?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Shortly before the United States entered the recent war, when the Army appropriation was under consideration, I prepared a provision—and it was adopted by the committee—which authorized the Secretary of War to designate a garrison or garrisons of those already established where young men who had enlisted in the service could be brought and educated along the lines that were suggested. I think that is the first legislation there was on the subject. The war came on shortly afterwards, and there was never any opportunity given to put that provision of the law into effect. How many men would have taken advantage of it I do not know. The Senator from Tennessee says about 27,000 young men are being trained.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I may interrupt at that point, I desire to say the Senator from Tennessee is inaccurate about that. The education branch of the War Plans Division reports that 60,000 men were undergoing such training on February 24, 1920.

Mr. McKELLAR. The figures given by me were dated October 31, 1919, and, according to those figures, there were 27,132 men in the Army receiving the benefits of the training. I am glad to know that there are now more taking advantage of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are now 60,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to modify the amendment by striking out the figures "71;" otherwise the amendment is absolutely correct. If the Senate adopts the amendment there will be no trouble about making the bill conform to it. It is practically impossible to make an amendment conform to an entire bill at one time, and various other amendments will have to be adopted in order to make it conform. Of course that can be done and will be done at the proper time. I repeat, if the Senate adopts the amendment there will be no difficulty about making such other changes as will be necessary throughout the bill. That is constantly being done, as we all know, in the case of nearly every bill that is amended. When an amendment is adopted frequently other provisions of the bill require to be amended in order to make the amendment properly fit in. That is all that is necessary in this case; and that is the extent of the Senator's criticism of the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is opposed to the amendment, of course, but otherwise——

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator knows perfectly well that sections 7 to 12 fix the strength of the Regular Army, does he not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and if this amendment should be adopted they can be changed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Are they not the sections to amend, then?

Mr. McKELLAR. The question has not been finally determined; the bill has simply been read for committee amendments, and it is now open to further amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, the Senator does not answer the question.

Mr. McKELLAR. The strength of the Army is fixed at 300,000 in the amendment, and if the amendment is adopted the other sections can be correspondingly amended.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but will not that necessitate a complete reallotment of the branches of the service?

Mr. McKELLAR. It will necessitate a changing of the bill precisely as the striking out of the provision for compulsory universal military training necessitated changing various parts of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Again the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. McKELLAR. Nearly a hundred amendments were offered by the Senator from New Jersey, with a view simply to striking out of the bill the provisions in regard to universal military training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was not the point under discussion at all; the Senator from Tennessee is elusive. The fact is that the amendments of the Senator from New Jersey had no effect upon the strength of the Regular Army; they did not touch it. The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee does; it is intended to; but, instead of reaching the question in those sections where the strength of the Army is fixed, he reaches it by another and new section, and I do not know which section is going to control. I have some regard for the form of legislation; the Senator from Tennessee has not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, of course the question here is whether or not we are going to adopt compulsory education in the Regular Army. If we adopt it, then it will be easy enough, as the Senator from New York and as every other Senator in this body knows, to make the bill conform to that provision. The question that I am trying to get a vote on is whether or not we are going to have compulsory education in the Army; the details can be easily arranged.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator believe that no man should serve in the Army more than three years?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so; I think just as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] so well stated on Friday last in discussing the bill generally, that the term of service should be, as he put it, for one year and then the soldier should be graduated into the reserves. My amendment provides a little different arrangement, but is in line with what the Senator from Minnesota argued for.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, the Senator does not want any more of the old-time noncommissioned officers?

Mr. McKELLAR. Provision is made in the amendment for noncommissioned officers such as may be necessary for training the young men as they come into the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But they are included in the 300,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, I give it up, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee as modified.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	Harrison	Moses	Smith, Md.
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Smoot
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Nelson	Spencer
Colt	Kendrick	New	Swanson
Cummins	Kenyon	Nugent	Thomas
Curtis	Keyes	Page	Trammell
Dial	Kirby	Phipps	Wadsworth
Glass	Lenroot	Poindexter	Warren
Gronna	Lodge	Pomerene
Hale	McKellar	Sheppard

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] on account of illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent, due to illness.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of the absent Members.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. EDGE and Mr. MCCORMICK answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. STERLING, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. BRANDEGEE, and Mr. POMERENE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may we have the amendment reported, so that Senators will know what they are about to vote upon? I do not ask that the whole amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee be read. As I understand it, his amendment provides for compulsory education in the Army, and the amendment which I have proposed to his amendment provides that soldiers shall be given the opportunity to be educated, if they desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Mississippi proposes to strike out the word "required" in the proposed amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "given the opportunity," so that it will read:

In addition to military training, soldiers while in active service shall hereafter be given the opportunity to study and receive instruction of not less than three hours per day in any scholastic week of five days.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] as amended.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. MCKELLAR. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not see why the Senate should adopt this amendment. It should be rejected for the very reason that the law now provides for what is proposed to be accomplished by the amendment; and not only that, but appropriations have been made to carry it into effect, and there are over 50,000 private soldiers now receiving this education.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Utah is absolutely correct. It is now the law.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, does the Senator from Tennessee desire to press his motion to strike out all the sections providing for the voluntary system?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Yes; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon what amendment does the Senator from Tennessee ask for the yeas and nays?

Mr. MCKELLAR. On the original amendment I offered to strike out the voluntary system.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the Senator from Tennessee withdrew the original amendment offered by him and that there is nothing now before the Senate.

Mr. MCKELLAR. If that is the case, I offer it again in its original form.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask if the purpose of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee would not in effect be reached when it comes to concurring in the amendment as amended? Then those who are opposed to that amendment with the voluntary system in it can vote against it. It seems to me the question to strike out would arise naturally on the question as to whether the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole should be concurred in or defeated.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I will remind the Senator that it is not a motion to strike out and insert; it is a motion perfecting the original text, so that it would not be true that there would be a vote upon it in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the matter stands now, the original text was amended by the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and the Senate has just rejected the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. The Chair now understands the Senator from Tennessee offers another amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Tennessee moves as an amendment to strike out those sections pertaining to military training, sections 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 58, 59, 60, 65, and 76——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Section 76 has already been stricken from the bill.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Then I want to perfect my motion by omitting section 76.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified. Upon his amendment as modified the Senator from Tennessee demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on this question, but I am told by him that if he were present he could vote as I would vote. I am therefore at liberty to vote and I vote "nay."

Mr. MCCORMICK (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON]. If he were present, I am advised that he would vote as I am about to vote, and therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], with whom I have a pair, being absent, I transfer my pair to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], but under the arrangement which I have with him I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] which I transfer to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. I understand that that Senator has not voted. I therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and vote "nay."

Mr. KIRBY. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is absent on account of illness. I do not know how he would vote if present. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is absent on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of illness. If he were present and not paired, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this question the yeas are 9 and the nays are 37, and 4 Senators, namely, Senators HARRIS, MOSES, SMITH of Maryland, and WARREN, have announced pairs. There is a quorum present.

So Mr. McKELLAR's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer an amendment and ask that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent to have two amendments printed which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 13, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 12, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee, our Father in heaven, for the manifold blessings Thou hast bestowed upon us. Not least of these is a Government of the people, by the people, for the people, which guarantees to each man the right to think his own thoughts, live his own convictions, worship Thee according to the dictates of conscience, and do unto others as he would be done by.

Though the world is full of sin, good abounds. Though there are evils, right prevails; hate, though love is in the ascendency; much sorrow, though happiness is the normal.

Guide us by the spirit of grace that perfection may at last obtain in each man's heart, to the glory of Thy holy name. In the spirit of Christ the Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, April 10, 1920, was read and approved.

DEPORTATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes in respect to some matters of deportation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes in respect to matters of deportation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the present situation concerning certain deportation cases. I wish to call attention to the fact that this morning, if the Nickle Plate train from Chicago was on time, there arrived in New York from New Orleans one Paul Bosco, who is, in my opinion, a dangerous alien, an anarchist, and an enemy of this country. The evidence against this man was such that in New Orleans his application for release on bond was denied. Appeals were made to let him out on $500 bond and denied. These appeals were made by New York attorneys who devote much time to the interests of Socialists, I. W. W's, and anarchists. Next the appeal was made to have the bond fixed at $1,000, and to have the alien transferred to New York. Finally on the matter of the appeal the case was taken over by another attorney, Mr. Weinberger, on the belief that the first attorney was offensive to the Department of Labor. Weinberger, who continuously represents anarchists, got this fellow's bond reduced to $1,000, the bond to be placed at Ellis Island, New York, the man to be transferred from New Orleans to New York at Government expense, and there to be released on that bond, there to connive and bring about proceedings that will keep him in the country, even though he said at his hearing that he did not care to have an attorney; that he was perfectly willing to be deported; even though he stood up in the court room at Morgantown, W. Va., after he had been convicted, and said that he hoped the red flag would replace the Stars and Stripes in the United States at an early date.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, by whose order was that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. By order of the Assistant Secretary of Labor.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Post.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert a digest of that file and some other matters in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall put that digest at the end of my remarks, together with some explanatory comment, so all may see the processes by which these fellows are protected. This alien, Bosco, believes in force against the Government. He wants the red flag in place of the Stars and Stripes. And yet, Mr. Speaker, I say that it is more than an even bet that he will never be deported from the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what I have been telling the gentleman for months.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We have plenty of law. Something is the matter with the execution of it. When there is doubt, the decision is against the Government.

According to the newspapers on Saturday morning, the Assistant Secretary of Labor, in the case of Thomas Truss, of Baltimore, arrested as a communist and ordered deported, has ordered Truss released. He referred to this case at length as typical of the thousands which he will be called upon to decide, and will, I suppose, release ninety-five out of every one hundred thereof. The question hangs on whether Truss was a member of the Russian Workers, and the evidence shows that Truss was in and out of the I. W. W. and in and out of the Russian Workers' Associations, also a church member, and that while he was out of the Russian Workers probably at the time of his arrest he was then the instrument in the city of Baltimore for bringing communist organizers and I. W. W. agitators to Baltimore. In other words, he is, in my opinion, an undesirable alien in the United States and of the very type that is working day and night to undermine this Government and preach its overthrow by force. One can split hairs on these cases until the law itself is forgotten.

In conclusion, let me say that it has been stated in one or two newspapers that the chairman of the Immigration Committee and the Sergeant at Arms of the House have removed papers from the files of the Department of Labor in certain deportation cases, and particularly in the case of Martens, the so-called Russian ambassador. I want to state that that is not the fact at all. The committee has not called for or even looked at the papers in the case of Martens. The committee is examining other papers at the department. The rule down there is that Members of Congress, individually, can not take out papers. I never heard of a Member of Congress being able to secure even copies of papers, notwithstanding the fact that these attorneys for anarchists have no difficulty at all in having copies made of complete files for their use against the Government. I find further that when these deportation cases are decided, it is stated in these records that if there is any doubt, the benefit of the doubt is given to the alien and against the United States Government.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman give the House some information as to who is responsible for the policy wherein an attorney for an alien can get copies of papers and a Congressman can not even get copies?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not know that Congressmen can not get copies. I can not get copies.

Mr. GARNER. Who is responsible for that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I find that in certain cases that I have asked for the papers are lost.

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman does not answer my question. If the gentleman can give the House the information, the House ought to know it. Who is responsible in that department for the policy that enables one man to get copies and another man not to get copies?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that his time be extended for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In answer to the question, it is my opinion that the Department of Labor is being bored from within.

Mr. GARNER. But that is not a clear statement. I want to get down to who is who and to put my finger on him. The gentleman is dealing with the Department of Labor. Who is responsible in the Department of Labor for the policy that enables one man to get a copy of a paper and that a Congressman can not get a copy of the same paper?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not know just who is responsible for that.

Mr. GARNER. That is the trouble. Has not the gentleman's committee power to investigate that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think so.

Mr. GARNER. Then, you ought to find it out.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee, who has this matter under investigation, in his opinion, what per cent of this Department of Labor is socialist, what per cent is communist, and what per cent anarchist?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, I can not divide it.

Mr. GARNER. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And I am not giving an opinion.

Mr. GARNER. I do not think that is worth a great deal, but, as a matter of fact, he who is responsible is the one, I think, can be ascertained by the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me explain the situation. Here is the Department of Justice making a number of arrests, 2,700 or more, for deportation. The cases are turned over to the Department of Labor. The Commissioner of Immigration recommends deportation. The Assistant Secretary of Labor cancels the warrant. The Department of Justice can not make a charge against another department of the Government, or does not want to. But, if it answers the gentleman, here is the Department of Labor, through the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Post, resolving in favor of the alien wherever he can. The net result is that the large amount of money authorized by this Congress to be placed in the Department of Justice for arrest of radical and revolutionary persons has gone for little, and the further great amount placed in the hands of the Department of Labor for the deportation of such undesirable aliens has likewise gone for little. The law says the decision of the Secretary shall be final.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman does not intend to say it is the policy of the Department of Labor which prevents Members of Congress from getting a paper or papers but which permits counsel for the defense to get them?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No. What I said was that the policy is that an individual request for files to be taken out by Members of Congress could not be granted.

Mr. GARD. But there is no policy which keeps them from a Member of Congress and gives them to an attorney for the defense?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I suppose the papers are open to anyone who will go and see for themselves if they can find them. They are pretty hard to find. Attorneys for these radicals get copies made for them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has it not always been the policy of the department not to allow papers on file to be taken out?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Somebody came to me a few days ago and told me that a subcommittee of the Committee on Immigration was going to take the Sergeant at Arms and go down and gobble up a lot of documents, and I told them they had better keep out of it, that they had no right to do it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It has not been done, and was not proposed to be done in that manner.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They could issue a subpœna duces tecum on one of these fellows and make him bring the papers before the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The matter has not reached that stage. These files appear to be at loose ends. To take others out would make a further mess of them. What the committee particularly wanted was some files in relation to certain cases from the Pacific Northwest of aliens cited for deportation, taken to New York, released, and returned to that country. Some were placed at liberty to report to the inspector. The minute they were placed at liberty they got on box cars and left for other parts to continue their work of preaching revolution and destruction. Some have been rearrested. Some will be sent to New York again. All at Government expense.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let us see if I can get it in the RECORD. I want to find out why somebody has not taken action with reference to the Department of Labor and the individual who is responsible for certain policies. I want to see if I get the gentleman's statement correctly. If I understand the gentleman, he thinks the policy of the Department of Labor is to permit attorneys for aliens to go there and get copies of papers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I will tell you exactly what I said.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman made that statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I said it was stated to me that a Member of Congress could not take out papers——

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman stated——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I did say—and I will tell the gentleman what I did say—that it seemed possible for attorneys representing, in my opinion, dangerous aliens to get copies of any papers they wanted.

Mr. GARNER. Exactly. Now, may I get the other statement the gentleman makes, so as to verify that; and if the gentleman will verify that, and as a matter of fact locate the individual, it is possible we may get some rectifying action, because there is an executive branch yet in existence and some people control these men. There is a further charge made by the gentleman that the Department of Labor has resolved the doubt in favor of aliens, anarchists, and——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. As a matter of record, wherever there was a doubt they have resolved it in favor of the aliens.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, there is an intimation coming from the gentleman's suggestion that the Department of Labor is not being properly administered in reference to these cases of aliens brought up for deportation. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not an intimation but a statement that the policy is, in case of doubt, to favor the aliens.

Mr. GARNER. If it is being improperly administered and the gentleman's committee is busy ascertaining that those are facts and will act, I will join, and I think many Members over here will join the gentleman in doing what we can to rectify such a condition and reduce such expenditures.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McARTHUR. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. McARTHUR. Why not transfer this matter to the Department of Justice, where it properly belongs? [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, that matter is being considered by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. It involves a great deal more than appears at first thought. [Applause.]

Under leave granted, I present an analysis of the case of Paul Bosco, an alien, Bureau of Immigration file No. 54616–242.

Bosco was born in the southern part of Russia, close to the German frontier.

The case, it seems, originated, in so far as the Department of Labor, Bureau of Immigration, is concerned, with a personal letter written by United States District Attorney Stuart W. Walker, at Martinsburg, W. Va., dated June 4, 1919, and addressed to Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General, which reads as follows:

Permit me to express my very great delight in learning from the papers that the dastardly attempt on your life and that of your family was only an attempt and that no harm befell you or yours. At the same time of the expression of this gratification on my part, I hope it will not be regarded as amiss or improper on my part to call your attention to a case from my district disposed of on the 18th day of January, 1918, of the United States against Paul Bosco. Bosco came to this country from the southern part of Russia, on the German border.

On inquiry from the department under date of February 27, 1919, which doubtless is in your files, I undertook to give a history of this man as gathered by me in this trial, in opposition to a commutation of his sentence or pardon. I have since learned through the press that this man has either been pardoned or his sentence reduced, and my mind necessarily goes back to this case on learning the dastardly attempt on your life by some one the other night. One of the men implicated with this Bosco, by the name of Frank Johnson, and on whom I have abundance of evidence to convict, is a fugitive from justice. I have traced him through Ohio to New York, but have been unable to locate him.

Bosco is such a dangerous character, and was so considered by the labor organization in Morgantown, this district, where he committed the overt acts against the Government, and for which he was convicted, that he was ejected bodily from the labor organization's headquarters and his former associates came in numbers to Parkersburg, where he was tried, and testified against him. They were so apprehensive of the dastardliness of this man and his associates that they warned the marshal of this district that danger might exist for me in the trial of the case if any bitter denunciations should be used against Bosco. The marshal therefore stationed through the court room his deputies in order to forestall any attempt that might be made by this man's associates.

I did not hesitate in vigorously going after him and his kind in the argument of the case, and the jury very promptly convicted him. At the time of his sentence, as reported in my letter of February 27 last, he defiantly in that crowded court room announced to the court that he hoped that when he would be released from the Atlanta Penitentiary he would find the red flag waving over the American flag.

I simply give you these facts, not in complaint of his sentence having been reduced or his having been pardoned, as I have no right to do so, and I want to be understood as not in the slightest complaining; what I want to suggest is that this man, in the event of his not having yet been released from the Atlanta Penitentiary, be immediately deported. I have no question as to his dangerous tendencies, nor have I any question as to the dangerous tendencies of this man Johnson, whom I have not been able to locate. The third man who was indicted with these two men was a citizen of German extraction from Morgantown, this district, and was defended and cleared by Mr. Stedman, of Chicago, who was sent there to defend him. Gneiser is the man referred to as being defended by Stedman. Gneiser may have been properly acquitted, because he showed remarkable shrewdness in his conduct with Bosco and Johnson, always putting them to the fore, and not implicating himself in any open way in the presence of witnesses. After he was acquitted he removed from Morgantown to Ohio.

I have letters in this office that the man Johnson wrote to Bosco, advising him to go to Ohio and register under the draft under the name of his brother, and then get passports in his brother's name, and leave this country. He told Bosco that he so much resembled his brother that he could take his brother's photograph and fool the Government authorities, and in this way get away.

I do not know if this man Johnson has any connection with this bunch of anarchists in the East or not. We do know that after he went from Morgantown that he drifted through Ohio and then went to New York, where he had secured a scholarship in a socialist school in New York, or a school of kindred character.

I am worrying you with all these details because it might throw some light on the investigations the papers say the department is making, and I do urge, if it not be improper by reason of which I have learned and know of Bosco, that if he is pardoned or his sentence has been reduced, as the papers have indicated, that he is a fit subject for deportation. I have no question about his anarchistic tendencies, and his open defiance was illustrated in court.

This letter, or a copy of same, was transmitted to the Secretary of Labor under date of June 17, 1919, by Claud R. Porter, Assistant Attorney General, with a letter from Mr. Porter, reading as follows:

I have the honor to transmit herewith for your consideration a copy of a letter from the United States Attorney at Martinsburg, W. Va., with respect to one Paul Bosco, who is now serving a term of two years in the Atlanta Penitentiary for violation of the espionage act. Bosco is of strong anarchistic tendencies, and while he was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment, the same has been commuted by the President to two years.

Bosco's term will expire on September 1, 1919, and in view of his anarchistic tendencies it is suggested that steps be taken to have him deported promptly upon his release from the Atlanta Penitentiary on September 1. Mr. Walker, the district attorney, in a personal interview with officials of this department, laid stress upon the bad character of this man.

The letter from Mr. Porter in the Immigration files bears the following indorsement written across the face in ink:

June, 1918: Issue W/A Anarch, Anarchize, Anarcotem, Anotoid, Disbeliever. Send to Jacksonville with copy of this letter and its inclosure.

The five words in this memorandum are code words for various charges to be contained in the warrant of arrest, same pertaining to anarchists, disbelievers in government, etc.

The formal warrant of arrest was issued June 20, 1919, signed by Acting Secretary Abercrombie, and reads as follows:

No. 54616/242. Incl. 702.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
Washington.

To Thomas V. Kirk, inspector in charge, Jacksonville, Fla., or to any immigrant inspector in the service of the United States.

Whereas, from evidence submitted to me, it appears that the alien, Paul Bosco, who landed at an unknown port on or about the 1st day of January, 1916, has been found in the United States in violation of the act approved October 16, 1918, for the following, among other, reasons: That he is an alien anarchist; that he believes in the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States; that he believes in the overthrow by force or violence of all forms of law; that he advocates the overthrow by force or violence of all forms of law; and that he disbelieves in all organized government.

I, John W. Abercrombie, Acting Secretary of Labor, by virtue of the power and authority vested in me by the laws of the United States, do hereby command you to take into custody the said alien and grant him a hearing to enable him to show cause why he should not be deported in conformity with law.

The expenses of detention hereunder, if necessary, are authorized, payable from the appropriation "Expenses of regulating immigration, 1919." Pending further proceedings the alien may be released from custody upon furnishing satisfactory bond in the sum of $1,000.

For so doing, this shall be your sufficient warrant.

Witness my hand and seal this 20th day of June, 1919.

_____,
Acting Secretary of Labor.

[Exact copy as signed by John W. Abercrombie, mailed June 20, 1919.]

The same was transmitted under date of June 20, 1919, to the inspector in charge at Jacksonville, Fla., with the following memorandum:

The bureau transmits herewith formal warrant of arrest issued today for Paul Bosco, who is at present an inmate of the Federal Penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga. A copy of a letter from the Assistant Attorney General, with its inclosure, is also inclosed.

A hearing on the warrant of arrest under deportation proceedings was granted the alien, Paul Bosco, by Immigration Inspector Thomas V. Kirk at the United States Penitentiary in Atlanta, Ga., under date of June 25, 1919. Bosco at that time was serving a sentence for violation of the espionage act. A copy of the testimony adduced at the hearing follows:

Alien sworn:

Q. What is your name?—A. Paul Bosco.

Q. Have you ever been known by any other name?—A. No.

Q. My object in coming here is to give you an opportunity to show cause why you should not be deported at the expiration of your prison sentence. I have a warrant for your arrest signed by John W. Abercrombie, Acting Secretary of the Department of Labor, dated June 20, 1919, No. 54616/242, the charge against you reading as follows: "That he is an alien anarchist; that he believes in the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States; that he believes in the overthrow by force or violence of all forms of law; that he advocates the overthrow by force or violence of all forms of law; and that he disbelieves in all organized government." You are entitled to be represented by an attorney at this hearing.—A. I do not think it necessary to have an attorney.

Q. Then, do you waive all right for an attorney and are you ready for the hearing to proceed?—A. Yes.

Q. I hand you the warrant which you will please read.—A. (Alien reads the warrant carefully and says:) I am not an anarchist. I did not know just what anarchy was until I was accused of it. After I was accused of it I read up and studied on it to find out what anarchy was, and I must say after informing myself I have no objections to anarchists or their principles, as the Constitution of the United States does not forbid anarchistic propaganda or anarchistic doctrines.

Q. Does your understanding of anarchy agree with anarchy or the definition of anarchists as given in the United States immigration law and as set forth specifically in the charge against you in the warrant which you have just read?—A. (Alien carefully reads charge in the warrant, then hesitates for some little time and says:) I do not believe in the overthrow of law, but whenever laws are against the people I see no reason why the people should not resist their enforcement by force if it is attempted to enforce the law by force. Whenever Congress passes a law that is contrary to the interests of the people and contrary to the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, then the people are justified in resisting the enforcement of such a law in any way they can—this to uphold their constitutional rights. I think it is the duty of every workingman to take this position.

Q. Of what country are you a citizen or subject?—A. I was born in Russia.

Q. How old are you?—A. I am 27 years old.

Q. When did you first come to the United States?—A. In 1911, from Russia, and landed at Hoboken, N. J., January, 1911, on the Kaiserin August Victoria.

Q. Have you ever taken any steps to become a citizen of the United States or any other country?—A. Yes; I got my "first papers" for United States citizenship at Moundsville, W. Va., in 1914.

Q. Have you ever gotten full citizenship papers?—A. No, sir.

Q. Why not?—A. Just neglect.

Q. Are you married?—A. No.

Q. Have you any relatives in the United States?—A. Yes; a brother, George Bosco, 510 Morgan Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Q. Does he have the same ideas about Government that you have?—A. I don't know what he believes.

Q. When you first came to the United States how much money did you bring?—A. About $60. Brought nothing else to amount to anything.

Q. How much money have you now?—A. About $30. I left some property in Russia, but don't think it in such shape that I could get anything out of it now.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. I have been a glass cutter since I was about 14 years old. For a few months before I was arrested I was in business for myself, selling ice cream and drinks at Morgantown, W. Va.

Q. Why were you arrested?—A. I was arrested at Morgantown, W. Va., for distributing leaflets; the subject of the leaflets was "The Price We Pay."

Q. By what organization was this leaflet gotten up?—A. By the Socialist Party.

Q. Did you distribute any of the leaflets?—A. I sold some socialistic propaganda, as we usually do.

Q. What do you mean by "we"?—A. I mean Socialists.

Q. Just what kind of propaganda did you sell?—A. They did not make any charge against me for selling literature. The charge against me was for distributing the leaflet "The Price We Pay," which was an argument against world militarism.

Q. For what offense were you tried and convicted and sent to this prison?—A. As I understand it, I was arrested and convicted and sent here for distributing the leaflet "The Price We Pay." This leaflet was written by John Santuckner, of Chicago, I think, about 1915.

Q. When were you convicted?—A. I was convicted at Parkersburg January 16, 1918.

Q. When did you first become identified with anarchists?—A. I never was identified with an organization of that kind.

Q. When you were convicted at Parkersburg for how long were you sentenced?—A. For 10 years.

Q. When your sentence and term in penitentiary for 10 years was announced in the crowded court at Parkersburg did you not state defiantly that you hoped that when you were released from the penitentiary that you would find the red flag waving over the American flag?—A. Yes; I said that.

Q. Do you still hope that?—A. Yes.

Q. And you don't call that anarchy?—A. I don't call that anarchy because the red flag is an international emblem.

Q. You have been living in this country how long?—A. About eight years.

Q. And you think you are better qualified to say what kind of a flag we should have and what kind of laws Congress should make than our best statesmen who were born in this country?—A. I don't mean especially for this country, but for the world.

Q. Then you claim you are better qualified to say what kind of laws the world should have than our President and our Congressmen?—A. I say this because the Constitution of the United States gives every man of the United States a right to express his opinion; but before I said this I carefully looked over the Constitution of the United States and it does guarantee free speech, free press, and free assemblage.

Q. After being in this country seven years you regard yourself a first-class constitutional lawyer and presume to know more about the Constitution than our President and our best Congressmen, do you?—A. The Constitution is plain on free speech, free press, and free assemblage.

Q. Don't you think it would be better for a newcomer to this country to leave the interpretation of the Constitution and the laws of the country to properly constituted authority, rather than to place your own interpretation on these matters, at least until you become a citizen of the United States?—A. I think the Constitution guarantees freedom for foreign people the same as for United States citizens, therefore I try to exercise my privilege.

Q. The Constitution does not give sufficient liberty to aliens as well as to United States citizens, and if you would be satisfied with the same kind of liberty that I and all other United States citizens have I do not think you would be in this trouble, do you?—(No answer.)

Q. Were you not treasurer of the liberty defense fund before you were arrested at Morgantown?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you collect any money in that capacity; and, if so, how much?—A. Yes; I did. I suppose about $50 or $75.

Q. Just what was the object of this organization?—A. The object was to raise some money to help some of our comrades who had been arrested.

Q. What do you mean by your comrades, some more international and constitutional lawyers like yourself, people who would like to have the red flag flying instead of the United States flag?—A. Comrades who did enjoy their constitutional rights.

Q. Is there any further statement you would like to make as to why you should not be deported to Russia after your sentence expires here?—A. If the United States authorities are not willing for working men to exercise industrial democracy, then I would not object to going back to free Russia.

FINDING.

Alien came to the United States from Russia, landing at Hoboken, N. J., in January, 1911; declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at Moundsville, W. Va., in 1914; was convicted for violation of the espionage act at Parkersburg, W. Va., in January, 1918, and given a sentence in the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for 10 years, which sentence has been reduced to 2 years. Sentence is due to expire in about 30 days. Alien says he does not belong to any organization of anarchists, but his declaration as to what he does believe in as to government and enforcement of law to my mind constitutes positive proof that he is an anarchist of the worst type, and it is recommended that he be deported as such at the expiration of his sentence.

In connection with this matter the department's special attention is called to a letter (copy inclosed) dated Morgantown, W. Va., June 4, 1919, from Stuart W. Walker, United States attorney, to the Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, United States Attorney General.

THOS. V. KIRK,
Examining Inspector.

Under date of July 15, 1919, the record of the hearing accorded Bosco was transmitted to the Bureau of Immigration for the action of the Department of Labor, together with a letter from the inspector in charge at Jacksonville, Fla., recommending the alien's deportation, and reading as follows:

Referring to department warrant No. 54616/242, dated June 20, 1919, I am inclosing herewith record of hearing in the case of the alien, Paul Bosco, now detained in the United States penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., whose term will expire in about 30 days.

For the reasons stated in the finding it is recommended that the alien be deported as an anarchist at the expiration of his prison sentence.

The record was reviewed by the law division of the Bureau of Immigration, and under date of July 21, 1919, a memorandum for the Acting Secretary was prepared and signed by A. Caminetti, Commissioner General of Immigration, stating:

The bureau is of the opinion that the alien's own statements and admissions clearly substantiate all of the charges in the warrant of arrest, and upon those grounds his deportation to Russia at Government expense is recommended when possible * * *; and it is further recommended that immediately upon his release—this means release from the penitentiary—he be taken into custody by this service and detained until his removal from the country can be accomplished.

This memorandum was approved by the Acting Secretary, and bears the notation in pencil as follows: "Where shall we hold him; New Orleans?"

While quoting another memorandum, it is desired to call particular attention to the above-quoted paragraph, which indicates the intention of holding this alien without bond until his deportation can be accomplished.

The memorandum now follows:

The above-named alien was arrested at the Federal prison, Atlanta, Ga., on the grounds that he is an alien anarchist; that he believes in the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States; that he believes in the overthrow by force or violence of all forms of law; that he advocates the overthrow by force or violence of all forms of law; and that he disbelieves in all organized government.

This case arose as the result of the alien's conviction and sentence in the Federal courts at Parkersburg, W. Va., for violation of the espionage act, the sentence at first being 10 years in the above-named prison, but latter commuted to two years. He states that he was convicted and sentenced for distributing leaflets at Morgantown, W. Va., entitled "The Price We Pay," and that such leaflets were prepared by the Socialist Party; also that he sold other socialistic propaganda. He further admits that at the time sentence was pronounced in the crowded court room at Parkersburg, he stated defiantly that he hoped that when he was released from the penitentiary he would find the red flag waving over the American flag, and he still hopes that this may be the case. He evidently sets himself up as a constitutional authority, saying that he did not believe the above statement he made in the court room was anarchistic because the red flag is an international emblem. He was given an opportunity to read the warrant. After doing so he stated as follows: "I am not an anarchist. I did not know just what anarchy was until I was accused of it. After I was accused of it, I read up and studied on it to find out what anarchy was, and I must say after informing myself I have no objections to anarchists or their principles, as the Constitution of the United States does not forbid anarchistic propaganda or anarchistic doctrines. He was then asked if his understanding of anarchy agreed with the definition of anarchy as given in the United States immigration law and as set forth in the warrant of arrest, and replied, after considerable hesitation: "I do not believe in the overthrow of law, but whenever laws are against the people I see no reason why the people should not resist their enforcement by force, if it is attempted to enforce the law by force. Whenever Congress passes a law that is contrary to the interests of the people and contrary to the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, then the people are justified in resisting the enforcement of such a law in any way they can—this to uphold their constitutional rights. I think it is the duty of every workingman to take this position."

The alien has not taken out final citizenship papers and stated that he had not done so simply because of neglect. He says that he was treasurer of the liberty defense fund at Morgantown, W. Va., and during the period of his office collectetd about $75, the object of which was to assist some of his comrades who had been arrested.

In a letter to Attorney General Palmer, copy of which is made a part of the record, the United States attorney at Parkersburg, who prosecuted the alien under the espionage act, states that he is considered as a very dangerous man; that he was bodily ejected from the labor organization's headquarters at Morgantown, and that his former associates came in numbers to Parkersburg to testify against him; also that they considered him so dangerous that they warned the marshal of that district that danger might exist during the trial.

The bureau is of opinion that the alien's own statements and admissions clearly substantiate all of the charges in the warrant of arrest, and upon those grounds his deportation to Russia at Government expense is recommended, when possible. His term in the penitentiary will soon expire and it is further recommended that immediately upon his release he be taken into custody by this service and detained until his removal from the country can be accomplished.

Under date of July 24, 1919, the Assistant Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Acting Secretary of Labor, addressed the following letter to the Commissioner of Immigration at New Orleans:

The bureau transmits herewith, for your information, a copy of a formal warrant of deportation issued to-day for Paul Bosco. This alien is confined in the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., but will be released from custody in about three weeks, at which time he will be delivered at your station by an officer detailed by the inspector in charge at Jacksonville for detention until after his deportation can be effected.

The expenses incident to such detention, including the expenses of delivering the alien at Ellis Island, New York Harbor, for deportation, as well as those of an attendant who will accompany him, if necessary, are authorized, payable from the appropriation "Expenses of regulating immigration, 1920."

It will be noted in this letter no provision is made for the release of this alien under bond. To the contrary, the instructions are to detain him until his deportation can be effected. The warrant for his deportation, dated July 24, 1919, reads as follows:

No. 24616/242 Incl. 2407.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
Washington.

To FREDERIC C. HOWE,
Commissioner of Immigration,
Ellis Island, New York Harbor:

Whereas from proofs submitted to me, after due hearing before Immigrant Inspector in Charge Thomas V. Kirk, held at the Federal Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., I have become satisfied that the alien, Paul Bosco, who landed at the port of New York, N. Y., ex steamship Kaiserin Auguste Victoria, on or about the 15th day of January, 1911, has been found in the United States in violation of the act approved October 16, 1918, to wit:

That he is an alien anarchist; that he believes in the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States; that he believes in the overthrow by force or violence of all forms of law; that he advocates the overthrow by force or violence of all forms of law; and that he disbelieves in all organized government, and may be deported in accordance therewith.

I, John W. Abercrombie, Acting Secretary of Labor, by virtue of the power and authority vested in me by the laws of the United States, do hereby command you to return said alien to Russia, the country whence he came, at the expense of the appropriation "Expenses of regulating immigration, 1920." You are directed to purchase transportation for the alien from New York to such point in Russia as you may designate at the lowest available rate, payable from the above-named appropriation.

For so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant.

Witness my hand and seal this 24th day of July, 1919.

———— ————,
Acting Secretary of Labor.

[Exact copy as signed by John W. Abercrombie, mailed July 25, 1919.]

Under the same date the formal notice of the issuing of said warrant of deportation was forwarded to the inspector in charge of the Immigration Service at Jacksonville, Fla.

Attention is again called to the fact that no bond was provided for in either the formal notice to the inspector at Jacksonville nor in the warrant of deportation. The formal notice referred to reads as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION,
Washington, July 24, 1919.

(54616/242)
INSPECTOR IN CHARGE IMMIGRATION SERVICE,
Jacksonville, Fla.

SIR: The bureau acknowledges the receipt of your letter of July 15, No. 122/116, transmitting record of hearing accorded the alien, Paul Bosco, who landed at the port of New York, N. Y., ex steamship Kaiserin Auguste Victoria, on or about January 15, 1911. After a careful examination of the evidence submitted in this case, the department is of opinion that the alien is in the United States in violation of law. You are therefore directed to cause him to be taken into custody and conveyed to New Orleans, La., the expenses incident to such conveyance, including the employment of an attendance to assist in delivery, if necessary, at a nominal compensation of $1 and expenses both ways, being authorized, payable from the appropriation "Expenses of regulating immigration, 1920."

Upon his release from prison by the proper authorities, the alien should be taken into custody and conveyed to New Orleans, La., for detention until his deportation can be effected.

Respectfully,
———— ————,
For the Commissioner General.

[Exact copy as signed by Alfred Hampton, mailed July 25, 1919, by ———— ————, assistant commissioner general.]

Approved:

[Exact copy as signed by John W. Abercrombie, mailed July 25, 1919, by ———— ————, Acting Secretary.]

Inclosed W. D. No. 2407.

Under date of July 24, 1919, an official copy of the warrant of deportation was sent to the Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island, N. Y., together with a memorandum reading as follows:

Official copy to the commissioner of immigration, Ellis Island, New York Harbor, for his information: The alien will be conveyed to your port, at such time as the necessary arrangements have been made, by an officer detailed by the commissioner of immigration at New Orleans, La., to whom advices should be forwarded at the proper time. The alien is at present confined in the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., but will be released in about three weeks, at which time he will be conveyed to New Orleans for detention until his deportation can be effected. No foreign address is given.

Under date of July 28, 1919, the inspector in charge at Jacksonville, Fla., addressed the following letter to the commissioner of immigration:

Referring to bureau letter of the 24th instant, No. 54616/242, directing that the alien, Paul Bosco, be conveyed to New Orleans for detention until his deportation can be effected, it is observed that the department warrant in the case of this alien, date, and number as given above, is issued to Frederic C. Howe, commissioner of immigration, Ellis Island, New York Harbor, N. Y.

It is thought at this office that the direction that the alien be conveyed to New Orleans for detention until such time as he can be deported is due to congestion at Ellis Island; but as the letter directs that he be conveyed to New Orleans and the warrant is issued to the commissioner at Ellis Island, it was thought advisable to call attention of the bureau to this matter, in order that the bureau's intentions will be carried out when the alien is conveyed to New Orleans for detention.

This letter was replied to by the commissioner of immigration under date of August 4, 1919, as follows:

Replying to your letter of the 28th ultimo, No. 122/116, relative to the case of Paul Bosco, you are requested to arrange with the commissioner of immigration at New Orleans to send an officer from his station to Atlanta for the purpose of taking the alien into custody upon his release from the Federal penitentiary and conveying him to New Orleans for detention until his deportation to Russia can be accomplished. The expenses will be payable from the allotment for your district.

Under date of July 30, 1919, the inspector in charge at Jacksonville, Fla., addressed the following communication with reference to this case to the Commissioner General of Immigration:

Referring to department warrant of deportation in the case of the alien, Paul Bosco, No. 54616/242, dated July 24, 1919, and to letter from the bureau to this office bearing the same date and number, directing that the alien be conveyed to New Orleans for detention until such time as he can be deported, I desire to suggest, inasmuch as the work at this office is very much congested at this time, that we would appreciate it if the bureau can arrange for Inspector Joseph H. Wallis, New Orleans, La., to take charge of this alien at the expiration of his prison sentence and convey him to New Orleans for detention until deportation can be effected.

For information of the bureau, I will state that I know this arrangement will be perfectly satisfactory to Mr. Wallis, and I may further state that it will be less expensive for Mr. Wallis to proceed from New Orleans to Atlanta and return than it will be for this office to detail an officer from Jacksonville for the purpose outlined.

Under date of August 6, 1919, the Commissioner General of Immigration addressed the following communication to the commissioner of immigration at New Orleans:

1. Please arrange to have Inspector Joseph H. Wallis proceed to Atlanta, Ga., upon receipt of advices from the Jacksonville office for the purpose of taking into custody and conveying to New Orleans for detention the alien, Paul Bosco, who is now confined in the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta and will be released in about three weeks.

2. The expenses incurred by Inspector Wallis in making the trip will be chargeable to the allotment of district No. 7.

And under the same date, August 6, addressed the following communication to the inspector in charge at Jacksonville, Fla.:

Replying to your letter of the 30th ultimo, No. 122/116, relative to the case of the alien, Paul Bosco, who is now confined in the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., you are advised that Inspector Joseph H. Wallis, New Orleans, La., has been directed to proceed to Atlanta upon receipt of advices from your office for the purpose of taking the alien into custody and conveying him to New Orleans for detention.

Under date of September 29, 1919, the inspector in charge at Jacksonville, Fla., addressed a letter to R. H. Marr, attorney at law, New Orleans. This letter reads as follows:

Replying to your letter of the 27th instant, I have to advise that the case of Paul Bosco, so far as this office is concerned, is closed.

For your information I will state that the alien had ample opportunity to secure an attorney at the time of his hearing and waived his right thereto, stating he did not regard it necessary for him to have an attorney.

A copy of same was transmitted to the Bureau of Immigration with a letter dated September 29, 1919, from the inspector in charge at Jacksonville, reading as follows:

Referring to bureau letter of August 6, 1919, No. 54616/242, and to warrant of deportation dated July 24, 1919, bearing the same number, in the case of the alien, Paul Bosco, I have to advise that this alien, upon the expiration of his sentence in the United States Penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., was taken into custody by Assistant Commissioner Joseph H. Wallis, of New Orleans, La., and conveyed to the immigration station at New Orleans for detention pending deportation. The alien is now detained at that port.

This office is just in receipt of a letter dated New Orleans, La., September 27, 1919, written by R. H. Marr, attorney at law, 1020–21 Hennen Building, which reads as follows:

"The United States Civil Liberties Bureau has asked me to look into the case of Paul Bosco, held here for deportation. I shall be pleased if you will be kind enough to furnish me with the reports in the case."

As this alien was given ample opportunity to secure an attorney at the time of his hearing, but waived his right to do so, I think the matter, so far as any lawyer is concerned, should be regarded as closed; however, if the bureau directs, I will furnish Attorney Marr with the record in the case. Copy of my reply to Mr. Marr's letter is inclosed herewith.

In addressing the letter to Attorney Marr the inspector in charge at Jacksonville was following a long-standing custom or regulation of the Immigration Bureau, to the effect that the Immigration Service could recognize only an attorney whom the alien had gone on record as desiring to appear in his behalf. The custom or regulation in a case of this kind, wherein the attorney claimed to have been retained by some outside sources in behalf of the alien, had, until recently, been to advise the alien of his right to counsel, and that such and such an attorney had claimed to be retained by such and such a party in his behalf, and in the event the alien then went on record as desiring said attorney to represent him, to recognize that attorney, but otherwise he was not to be recognized in the case.

Recently a new regulation with reference to attorneys has been issued, but even in this new regulation the alien has somewhat to say as to who shall or who shall not represent him. A regulation was also issued to the effect that it was unnecessary for an alien to have more than one attorney, and unless it were members of the same firm not more than one attorney should be recognized, and that before any attorney not a member of the same firm could be recognized in any particular in a deportation proceeding, the attorney first recognized must have gone on record as withdrawing entirely from the case. Special attention is called to this regulation with reference to attorneys in order that the correspondence which followed in connection with the Paul Bosco case may be more readily understood.

Under date of September 30, 1919, on a letterhead of the National Civil Liberties Bureau, No. 41 Union Square, New York, a letter was addressed to Hon. John W. Abercrombie, Acting Secretary of Labor, by Walter Nelles, listed as counsel for the beforementioned organization or society. This letter bears the indorsement in ink to the effect that it was referred October 1, 1919, to the Bureau of Immigration by Acting Secretary Abercrombie, and reads as follows:

NATIONAL CIVIL LIBERTIES BUREAU,
41 Union Square, New York, September 30, 1919.

(Officers: L. Hollingsworth Wood, chairman; Norman M. Thomas, vice chairman; Helen Phelps Stokes, treasurer; Albert De Silver, director; Paul J. Furnas, associate director; Walter Nelles, counsel. Directing committee: John S. Codman, Crystal Eastman, John Lovejoy Elliott, Edmund C. Evans, Edward W. Evans, William A. Fincke, John Haynes Holmes, Agnes Brown Leach, Judah L. Magnes, John Nevin Sayre.)

Hon. JOHN W. ABERCROMBIE,
Acting Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Paul Bosko, an alien who is to be deported to Russia via New York, is now being held at the immigration station at New Orleans. A correspondent there advises us that he can not be admitted to bail except by order from your office at Washington. I assume that in this case, as in others of Russians where deportation will not be practicable for a considerable time, bail will be permitted. If you will make the order I should be greatly obliged if you will let me know that you have done so. If any particular showing must be made before bail is granted, will you not let us know its nature?

Yours, very truly, WALTER NELLES.

The National Civil Liberties Bureau was brought into being by radicals of the Roger Baldwin type for the purpose of assisting men to evade the selective-service act. Baldwin, one of the organizers of the "Bureau," was convicted and served about one year in a Federal penitentiary for violating the selective-service act. This group of radicals were particularly active in and about New York City, and manufactured a multitude of "conscientious objectors," going so far as to furnish legal advice.

Under date of October 10, 1919, Charles Recht addressed the Commissioner General of Immigration as follows:

I appear for Paul Bosco, who is now held at New Orleans awaiting deportation to Russia.

As the department is not now in a position to return people to Russia, I would appreciate it if you would fix a reasonable amount, say $500, as bail for this man, and so instruct the department at New Orleans, until such time as his deportation can be effected.

This letter bears a footnote in pencil reading as follows:

Miss Weiss called at bureau and advised alien's friends have now raised $500 for bond. Consider advisability his release on bond on this or larger amount.

W. J. P.

The Miss Weiss referred to in footnote is Rose Weiss, an attorney in the law firm of Charles Recht. The latter, it will be remembered, is the same attorney who appeared with Caroline Lowe before the Bureau of Immigration in the cases of aliens brought from the Pacific coast to Ellis Island and later released.

Charles Recht is recognized in and around New York as attorney for many anarchists, I. W. W.'s, communists, and anti-Government organizations. Recht was appointed chief counsel and legal advisor for Ludwig K. C. Martens, which position he holds to-day. He is recognized as a clearing house for radicals actively opposing the Government.

Going back to Recht's letter of October 10, which has been quoted, special attention is called to the language used. He says, "I appear for Paul Bosco." He does not say that he was retained by Bosco, nor does he say who authorized him to appear in this alien's behalf. If all the regulations with reference to attorneys issued by the Department of Labor had been followed in this case, Recht could not and should not have been recognized as attorney for Bosco. That he was recognized as attorney, however, is shown by his letter of October 27, 1919, to the Commissioner General of Immigration, reading as follows:

Sometime ago I made application for the fixing of bail in the case of this alien, who is held at New Orleans awaiting deportation to Russia. As it is not likely that this deportation can be effected for some time, it would be advisable to fix bail at a reasonable sum. The friends of this alien have raised $500, which, under all the circumstances, might be accepted in this case.

And the reply thereto, under date of November 1, which reads as follows:

In response to your letter of the 27th ultimo, making application for bond in the case of Paul Bosco, now confined at New Orleans awaiting deportation to Russia, you are advised that the bureau will give the matter consideration within the near future and will inform you of its decision.

Special attention is called to this reply to Recht, wherein it is stated, with reference to the request that Recht made, that bond be fixed in the Bosco case, that the bureau would give consideration to the matter of bond, and would advise him later of its decision, thereby indicating that up to that time, November 1, 1919, no change had occurred in the original policy adopted at the time of the issuing of the warrant of arrest for Bosco with reference to his admittance to bond. Under date of November 7, 1919, Recht again addressed the Commissioner General of Immigration on the subject of bond for Bosco, his letter reading as follows:

Will you please advise us of your decision in regard to the release on bail of Paul Bosco, and oblige?

This letter evidently was not answered, and under date of November 26, 1919, he again addressed the Bureau of Immigration on the subject, his letter reading as follows:

I should appreciate it if you would advise us as to your decision in the matter of fixing bail for Paul Bosco. We have not heard from you for some time concerning the matter and shall appreciate your reply.

Attached to this letter in the files of the Bureau of Immigration, on a separate piece of paper, is a memoranda which reads:

Mc.: Why can't we bring this man on to Ellis Island? Rewrite memo. and refuse mail (bail). Initial "C."

The "memo." referred to in the foregoing note unquestionably referred to a memorandum for the acting Secretary dated December 2, 1919, indicating that the facts concerning the alien in question were reviewed. This memorandum, which was signed by the Commissioner General and approved by the Acting Secretary, specifically denied bond to the alien. The memorandum reads as follows:

The facts concerning this alien are reviewed in bureau memorandum indicated at marker, to which your attention is invited. He is now confined at the New Orleans detention station awaiting deportation to Russia. His attorney, Charles Recht, requests that alien be released under bond in the sum of $500 until such time as his removal from the country can be effected.

The evidence in this case shows that Bosco is considered a dangerous man, a menace to the community, and not a fit person to be at large. As he is a citizen of Russia and is to be deported to that country, the bureau recommends that the request for bond be denied, and that he be brought at once to Ellis Island and held there until his removal from the country can be effected.

Special attention is called to the last paragraph of this memorandum, which indicates that a decision to transfer this alien from New Orleans to Ellis Island until he could be deported had been reached. In following out this new policy, a telegram was sent the Immigration Service at New Orleans by the Assistant Commissioner General under date of December 4, 1919, reading as follows:

By direction Acting Secretary join Paul Bosco to Russell party for conveyance to New York. Caminetti—

And then signed by Alfred Hampton for the Commissioner General.

The same date Attorney Recht, of New York, was advised that the department had decided not to accept bond in the Bosco case. The letter from the Commissioner General to Attorney Recht reads as follows:

The bureau refers to your letter of November 26 and advises the department has decided not to accept bond in the case of Paul Bosco.

A memoranda concerning this case appears in the files of the Bureau of Immigration and reads as follows:

1. Full name of person arrested: Paul Bosco.
2. Number of case (Bureau of Immigration files): 54616/242.
3. Date of warrant of arrest: June 20, 1919.
4. Charge upon which arrest was made: That he is an alien anarchist; that he believes in the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States; that he believes in the overthrow by force and violence of all forms of law; that he advocates the overthrow by force or violence of all forms of law; and that he disbelieves in all organized government.
5. Date and place of arrest: June 25, 1919, Atlanta, Ga.
6. Disposition of case: Warrant of deportation to Russia at Government expense issued July 24, 1919. Transferred to New Orleans for deportation on release from United States penitentiary. Application for release on bond denied.
7. Status of case at present: Pending, awaiting deportation.

The Russell party referred to in the telegram of December 4, which was a pick-up deportation party, evidently took a different route from that intended, and the officer in charge at New Orleans so advised the bureau by wire, requesting instructions as to whether or not he should deliver Paul Bosco to Ellis Island. Under date of December 19, 1919, he was advised by the bureau in a telegram to defer delivery of Paul Bosco to New York pending further instructions. Under date of February 27, 1920, one Harry Weinberger, who lists himself as counselor at law, 261 Broadway, New York, addressed a letter to the Commissioner of Immigration concerning the alien, Paul Bosco. The letter reads as follows:

Will you kindly advise me in reference to the case of Paul Bosco, what the intentions of the department are in reference to him?

Will he be brought to New York City for deportation; and if so, how soon? Will time be given so that he may get clothes and other necessaries for deportation? Until the time of deportation, will any bail be fixed for him?

In reply to this letter the bureau addressed Weinberger under date of March 2, 1920. The letter reads as follows:

Referring to your letter of the 27th ultimo, you are advised that as you do not appear to be the attorney of record in the case of Paul Bosco the bureau is not in a position to advise you of the status of this matter or to furnish you with the information called for in the last paragraph of your letter. The alien was represented before the Jacksonville, Fla., office by Attorney R. H. Mar, of New Orleans, and before the department by Attorney Recht, of New York City.

If satisfactory evidence is placed before the bureau showing that Attorney Recht has withdrawn from the case the bureau will be glad to furnish you with such information from its files as you may desire and which it would be proper for it to furnish.

Special attention is called to the last paragraph of this letter, which indicates that, in so far as this attorney is concerned, the regulations pertaining to attorneys in cases of this nature were being strictly adhered to.

Under date of March 2, 1920, Weinberger again addressed the Bureau of Immigration, and particularly the Commissioner General of Immigration. His letter follows:

I have gotten a fairly full résumé of the papers in the case of Paul Bosco, now detained for deportation at New Orleans for more than six months.

I want to make certain requests in this case, and you may even consider them demands, as I feel that a palpable injustice has been done to this man. I desire complete stenographic copy of the evidence upon which his order for deportation was made. From his records, I understand, he is a socialist and not an anarchist. In fact, he was arrested and convicted for distributing the socialist pamphlet by Mr. Tucker entitled "The Price We Pay." Mr. Bosco got out his first naturalization papers and is willing to take out his second. He was a member of the Socialist Party and a member of the American Flint Glass Workers' Union and could get a job now as manager of the cutting department in the Weston (W. Va.) Glass House, Weston, W. Va., if he were released. Apparently the evidence on behalf of this man against his deportation was not properly presented to your department.

I ask—nay, even demand and insist—that his case be reopened; that bail be fixed at $1,000, so that we can perhaps obtain the same, and the case transferred from New Orleans to New York, where I can handle the matter. Unless, of course, if you will look into this record again yourself, you will determine that the order of deportation should be canceled and the man ordered released entirely.

I desire to be heard in this man's case. Of course, if he finally is deported, he should be ordered deported to soviet Russia. It certainly is a peculiar situation where a socialist who has filed his first application papers for citizenship should be deported as an anarchist, and in view of the fact that the individual is willing to file his application for final naturalization papers.

Does not your department realize that these cases come flooding in, and those calls for defense help from all parts of the country come to a few who are interested, until it is almost hopeless to give aid or obtain justice or get the release of individuals who, without friends and without money, are simply caught in the juggernaut of your administrative machinery?

Continually I get partial evidence of your department, I presume unknowingly, being made an instrument to wreak vengeance of private individuals. I might mention two cases—the Chinese I. W. W. and the case of Rasmus Rasmussen.

Mr. Caminetti, I wish you would begin to realize that American justice the world round is being weighed through your department and is being found wanting. I realize, of course, the flood of cases that your office has to handle. I realize that your machinery moves slowly, but it also grinds exceedingly small.

Let us have justice in this case. Fix bail at $1,000, and let this man come out. Let me examine the record and let me submit an argument. Bosco is without funds, and his health is broken. Apparently jails of America are to break the health of individuals as the wheels of old were to break their bones.

Wire me if you will fix bail at $1,000 in this case, and will you wire New Orleans to send me stenographic copy of the evidence and the charges in this case?

Special attention is called to the demands made by Weinberger, as these demands will be commented on later in this memorandum. Weinberger's letter was not answered immediately, and under date of March 8, 1920, he sent a telegram from New York City to the Immigration Bureau, which reads as follows:

Why the delay in decision Martinez, Perruchom, and Bosco cases? Send me letter of information.

Under date of March 9, 1920, the Commissioner General of Immigration addressed a letter to Weinberger, reading as follows:

Answering your letter of the 2d instant, which has further reference to the case of Paul Bosco, I beg to reiterate the statement made in my letter to you of the 2d instant that since you have submitted no evidence to show that you have succeeded the attorneys of record in this case, the record will not be submitted to you for your inspection.

Observing the tone of your letter, under acknowledgment, the bureau may be permitted to state that a plain statement of pertinent facts you desire to present might do just as well as the style you seem to affect.

I advised you in my letter of the 2d instant (which letter you have doubtless received some time since) of the manner in which you should proceed if you are desirous of representing this case at this late stage. If you do not choose to follow this course kindly advise the bureau to that effect.

It will be noted that the regulation with reference to attorneys is still being adhered to.

Under date of March 6, 1920, Charles Recht addressed the Commissioner General of Immigration with reference to Weinberger's appearance in the Bosco case. His letter follows:

This is to inform you that Mr. Harry Weinberger, of No. 261 Broadway, New York, has also been retained by Mr. Carl Bosco, who is held for deportation, as his attorney, to act in cooperation with me in his case. However, should there be any objection as to Mr. Bosco's having more than one attorney in this matter, it is agreeable to me that Mr. Weinberger hereafter be considered the sole counsel in this case.

Not hearing from you further on this matter, I shall take it that it is satisfactory that both Mr. Weinberger and myself shall be the attorneys for Mr. Bosco.

Under date of March 3, 1920, Weinberger addressed the following letter to the Commissioner General of Immigration in connection with this case:

I have asked Mr. Recht's office to write you a letter stating that I am one of the attorneys of Mr. Paul Bosco—as a matter of fact, his sole attorney.

I do not understand the authority of your department to state that only one attorney could represent an alien. As a matter of fact, he is entitled to as many attorneys as anyone else who is brought into a proceeding or court. However, Mr. Recht's office will write you that I am one of the attorneys, or, if necessary, that he has withdrawn.

Attention is called to the fact that Weinberger is questioning the authority of the department to make the regulation that it issued with reference to attorneys. Under date of March 10, 1920, Weinberger addressed another communication to the Commissioner General of Immigration with reference to the Bosco case. This letter reads as follows:

In re Paul Bosco, No. 54616/242, I beg to state:

First. That I understand that Mr. Charles Recht wrote your office stating that they are no longer attorney for Paul Bosco, but that I am. I understand he is writing again to-day.

Second. I beg to inform you that I have deposited with me $1,000 to be used as bail for Mr. Bosco, and in view of the fact of his service of period of time that he has spent in the jail at New Orleans, I think that this bail should be accepted and hope that you will authorize it to be deposited at Ellis Island.

time in Atlanta Penitentiary, under the espionage act, and the long

Third. I further beg to state that if the case is opened I have in my possession membership card of the Socialist Party of America of Paul Bosco, and of the Socialist Party of West Virginia, and affidivat of the secretary to the same effect, and I will submit all this, with additional evidence, as the fact that he belongs to a union and has his first naturalization papers. I think that when the evidence is completed that your department will order him released and not deported, and hope, therefore, that you will order at once that bail be fixed at $1,000, and that I be given an opportunity to submit the evidence in the case.

Fourth. If your records show that you have received authorization of the withdrawal of Mr. Recht, and my substitution, that you send me copy of the record so that I may see what is necessary for this man's defense.

In the meanwhile I hope you will deem it advisable to order Mr. Bosco's release on $1,000 bail, and send me wire if that bail will be accepted. I will try to get in touch with Mr. Recht's office to-night to write or wire you that he has withdrawn as attorney for Mr. Bosco, and I am now his attorney, though as a matter of fact you don't as yet point to any rule which shows that a man can not have more than one attorney, and you have not supplied the record, I believe, to Mr. Recht.

Under date of March 12, 1920, Charles Recht addressed another communication to the Commissioner General of Immigration concerning this case and Weinberger's appearance therein as counsel. This letter reads as follows:

Recently I wrote you with regard to the case of Paul Bosco, and stated that I was quite willing to withdraw from the case in favor of Mr. Harry Weinberger, an attorney of this city. Mr. Weinberger tells me that such communication has not reached you, and I therefore take this occasion of repeating that statement to you.

Under date of March 19 Weinberger telegraphs the Commissioner General of Immigration, as follows:

Will you fix bail one thousand Paul Bosco? Wire collect.

Under date of March 16, 1920, Weinberger addressed another letter to the Commissioner General of Immigration complaining bitterly as to the bureau's action in this case. His letter follows:

In re Paul Bosco, No. 54616/242, I wonder why the machinery in this case moves so slowly?

Can not I have the records, so that I might put in a defense for this man, and can not you come to an immediate decision and advise me that I can deposit $1,000 in bail, which I have in my possession now, for this man? Surely, two years in jail and more than six months down in New Orleans ought to be enough of an appeal to give a quick decision to accept the bail.

Wire me if you will accept the bail. Advise me by mail when I may expect the record, so that I may put in a defense for this man.

Under date of March 19, 1920, Weinberger addresses another letter to the Commissioner of Immigration, complaining because no answers to these letters and telegram had been received. His letter follows:

I sent you to-day the following telegram:

"Will you fix bail $1,000 Paul Bosco? Wire collect."

I have $1,000 in my possession, deposited by relatives for bail of Mr. Bosco. I think under all of the circumstances bail should be fixed at $1,000, and Ellis Island authorized to accept the same, and the case reopened. This man has been a long time in jail, and the facts call for immediate decision.

Under date of March 22 Weinberger addresses another letter to the Commissioner General of Immigration, again complaining because his communications have gone unanswered. His letter follows:

I sent you the following telegram:

"Will you accept bail $1,000 Paul Bosco? Wire."

I have $1,000 bail ready for this man. Will you admit him to bail, and order Ellis Island to accept same, and order the hearing continued in Ellis Island in reference to him.

This man has never had a proper defense, nor has his case been properly presented to your department. I am merely requesting simple justice on his behalf, and I am sure your department desires to do nothing but that. I feel that immediate action is desirable.

Under date of March 23, 1920, Weinberger addresses another telegram to the Commissioner General of Immigration, which reads as follows:

Will you accept bail $1,000 for Paul Bosco? Wire.

Under date of March 26, 1920, Weinberger addresses another letter to the Commissioner General of Immigration, renewing his demands in the Bosco case. His letter follows:

Can your department give any decision in the Paul Bosco case, now detained at New Orleans?

Apparently your department does not realize what it is to be in jail. I have made a simple request that his case be reopened, and that bail be fixed at $1,000, so that this man can have a proper day in court.

Kindly give this your immediate attention. Delay in a decision sometimes is worse than injustice. It is almost a crime.

Under date of March 25, 1920, a letter was dictated and prepared for the signature of the Assistant Secretary. This letter was addressed to Weinberger at New York, was submitted to the Assistant Secretary for his signature, was returned by the Assistant Secretary without signature to the Bureau of Immigration with the following notation in ink:

Application of alien's attorney in letter of March 26, 1920, for reopening, transfer of hearing to Ellis Island, and release on $1,000 bail is granted.

(Signed) LOUIS F. POST,
Assistant Secretary.

Another notation in ink in a different handwriting appears on this letter which was prepared and never sent, reading as follows:

Law Division, following instructions of Assistant Secretary, comply therewith. March 27, 1920. C.

The letter addressed to Weinberger but which was never sent reads as follows:

In answer to your letters of March 16, 19, and 22, 1920, concerning the release of Paul Bosco, now detained at New Orleans awaiting deportation, you are advised that the department, after a careful review of the facts in his case, is unable to grant your request for his release under bond in the sum of $1,000. In view of the activities of Bosco, leading up to his conviction and prison sentence of two years ago, and his general dangerous character, the department can not consider his release under bond in a sum of less than $5,000.

A new letter was prepared for and signed by the Assistant Secretary under date of March 29, 1920. This letter, which was sent to Weinberger, reads as follows:

Referring further to the case of Paul Bosco, now detained at New Orleans, La., awaiting deportation, you are advised that your demand contained in letter of March 2, 1920, that this alien be released upon bond in the sum of $1,000, is hereby granted. You are also advised that in compliance with your other demands alien is to be transferred from New Orleans to New York at an early date, and that upon arrival at the latter city the case will be reopened and you will have an opportunity to fully represent your client.

Special attention is called to the fact that Weinberger's "demands," which have hereinbefore been referred to, are granted in each instance. In this connection it is deemed proper to call attention to the fact that the alien was ordered removed from New Orleans to New York at Government expense, there to be released on bond. The customary and proper procedure in a case of this kind, if they were granting the demands to fix bond in the sum mentioned, would have been to have the bond go to the commissioner of immigration at New York City, and upon his report that said bond was satisfactory to have wired the commissioner of immigration at New Orleans that a satisfactory bond had been given and instructing him to release the alien from custody, in which case any new hearing in another proceeding arising from the reopening of the case would have then been held in New Orleans, the district in which the case originated; or in the event the alien or his counsel desired the hearing in some other district, the alien would have been obliged, therefore, to go to that district at his own expense and not at the expense of the Government.

The procedure in this case, however, was to grant all the "demands" of Weinberger and deliver the alien to whatever point was most convenient for Weinberger, as is shown by the letters that followed, viz, the letter to the commissioner of immigration at New Orleans, dated March 29, 1920, which reads as follows:

Referring to the case of Paul Bosco, your file No. 22050-15, you are directed to convey this alien to Ellis Island, New York Harbor, in connection with a deportation party which will probably leave Chicago, Ill., within a week or 10 days. You will be notified as to the exact date later.

Also, a letter from the Commissioner General to the commissioner at Ellis Island, N. Y., under same date, which reads as follows:

In connection with the case of Paul Bosco, now detained at New Orleans, La., awaiting deportation, you are advised that this alien will be conveyed to Ellis Island shortly with a deportation party. Upon his arrival he is to be released on a bond of $1,000 and his case reopened. Mr. Harry Weinberger will be the attorney in the case.

Weinberger, however, apparently was becoming uneasy that his demands were not acted on as speedily as he might desire, and under date of March 31 sent the following telegram to Louis F. Post, Assistant Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.:

Kindly wire New Orleans authority convey Paul Bosco to New York.
(Signed) HARRY WEINBERGER.

He followed this telegram up on the same date with a letter to Assistant Secretary Post reading as follows:

I sent you to-day the following telegram:
"Kindly wire New Orleans authority convey Paul Bosco to New York."
Will you kindly see that they get immediately authorization, so that Mr. Bosco may be brought to New York as soon as possible, and we can give bail here for him.

On the same date, March 31, 1919, he addressed another letter to Assistant Secretary Post, which reads as follows:

Thank you very much for your decision in the Paul Bosco case, to allow him out on bail, and arrangement re reopening of case, so that Mr. Bosco may have full opportunity to put in his defense.

Under date of April 1, 1920, Mr. Post addressed a letter to Weinberger, again advising him, in substance, that all his demands had been granted. This letter reads as follows:

Replying to your telegram and letter of the 31st, I quote, for your information, my original decision upon the case, as follows:
Application of alien's attorney in letter of March 2, 1920, for reopening, transfer of hearing to Ellis Island, and release on $1,000 bail is granted.
I believe this covers the point raised in your telegram, as I understand it.

In order that Weinberger might not be disappointed, a telegram under date of April 6, 1920, was addressed to New Orleans, instructing that alien Paul Bosco be joined to the Russell party—a deportation party—leaving Chicago April 10, via the Nickel Plate Railway, giving the train number and hour of departure from Chicago.

Mr. Speaker, Weinberger's practice consists almost solely of defending radicals who are attempting to undermine the Government of the United States. He has appeared in numerous cases for I. W. W.'s, anarchists, communists, and other brands of radicals, commonly calling themselves "class-war prisoners," which means a radical arrested and charged with or who has been convicted of the crimes of treason, syndicalism, sedition, and so forth. Many aliens have been turned over to him in his custody as their attorney by the Department of Labor, and it is understood he has been unable to produce many of these paroled radicals when called upon to do so. Therefore it can not be conceived that the department, especially the Assistant Secretary of Labor, is not advised of the general character of this attorney.

Next I desire to insert the report of the immigration inspector at Baltimore in the case of Thomas Truss, referred to by me. The report follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
IMMIGRATION SERVICE,
OFFICE COMMISSIONER OF IMMIGRATION,
Baltimore, Md., February 12, 1920.

(No. 5401.)

COMMISSIONER OF IMMIGRATION,
Baltimore, Md.:

In the matter of Thomas Truss, subject of warrant of arrest No. 54860/67, dated January 9, 1920, to whom hearings were given on January 20 and subsequent date, I beg leave to make the following report and hand you transcripts of the record, to which are attached numerous exhibits.

The alien is 33 years of age, a native of Russia, of Polish race, and claims to have entered the United States at this port in 1907. He has not declared his intention to become a citizen of this country. He married in this city in 1912 and has a wife and three children living here.

The testimony in this case is most voluminous, made necessary in part by alien's insistence in talking in English, which he did with the exception of comparatively few instances, when the use of an interpreter was imperative. The record will demonstrate that alien's English is very poor and that the stenographer had great difficulty in recording his answers as given. Alien was represented by three attorneys, who, with others of their firm, have joined in the signing of the accompanying brief, which criticizes most severely the entire administrative procedure—characterizes the hearing as most unfair, the examining inspector as arbitrary and prejudiced and as using reprehensible methods of questioning. The attention of the reviewing authorities is especially invited to this brief, and because of its comprehensiveness, the standing of the counsel, the analysis of the testimony, and the criticisms made it should have earnest consideration in the deciding of the case.

I shall endeavor to outline what the records, the seeming facts, disclose in this case, in support of the warrant charges and as indicating membership in such an order as is described in the act to which the warrant is based. As is fitting, I shall attempt to do this in disregard of the clamor and prejudice that have been injected into the proceedings.

On page 4 alien states that he used to belong to the Communist Party, which he joined about June or July, 1919, but that said organization ceased to exist "because it didn't have so many members." He had attended a meeting in this city last summer addressed by one Pinsky, an organizer from out of town, who advised the Polish people to form a branch here of the Communist Party and detailed the difference or distinction between the Socialist Party and the proposed new one. Alien claims that this man on the preceding night had addressed a meeting of the branch of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, of which alien is chairman or president, and that on this occasion alien first met Pinsky and came to know him. Alien claims that he went to the I. W. W. hall on this second night with this organizer simply because the latter had asked him to do so, the organizer saying he did not know the location (p. 6). He admitted that Pinsky was at that time an organizer of the Polish section of the Socialist Party, and at first seemed to admit that he distributed circulars advertising this meeting, which was on August 13 last. However, to his attorneys alien stated that the meeting for which he passed out circulars was that held on the first evening of Pinsky's visit here, when the latter addressed the clothing workers (p. 35). The testimony concerning these two meetings and alien's connection with and interest therein is quite involved and contradictory, so that it should be carefully studied.

Alien admitted that someone else had made out the application card for membership in the Communist Party in his name, which is Exhibit A, after several questions on the point professed not to know whether same was in the writing of the organizer Pinsky or in that of one Marosz (Andred Marosz), who had been elected temporary, and later permanent, secretary of the Polish branch of this party in this city, to which alien belonged. Alien identified his membership card (Exhibit B), which shows the date of his admission to have been September 5 last, and bears the indorsement of Morasz as secretary. Alien stated that he had this card in his house and that it was "laying" on his desk. To the examiner of the Department of Justice alien stated under oath, January 8 (see Exhibit P), that he had lost the one he got at a mass meeting, and did not know where it was. This card carried a 50-cent initiation stamp in the Communist Party in the space for the month of September, and canceled dues stamps for October and November, and alien acknowledged making these payments.

Alien was shown his name and statements of dues paid in the so-called membership book of the small Polish branch of the Communist Party, identified as such by the secretary who kept it, Andrew Marosz, and which is an exhibit in the latter's own case. (Warrant No. 54860–351.) Alien thinks that this secretary was the delegate from the Polish local to the city central committee, which is a fact. Alien corroborated the statements made by Marosz, and which are referred to in the back of the membership and dues book noted above; that he, Truss, sold certain books, received from Chicago but published by or for the Polish paper, Glos Robitniczy, in Detroit. Some of the proceeds of these sales, a proportion of the price of each book, was turned in by alien to Marosz, the secretary (p. 10), as revenue for the branch. The paper referred to is the organ of the Communist Party in the Polish language, of which alien is aware (pp. 11 and 23), and alien has subscribed thereto for five or six months. Indeed, Exhibit I, a letter from this paper to alien, dated June 14, 1919, evidences that he sold said paper in this city, was paid $9.10 by check at that time, and that 10 copies would be sent every day to him. Alien admitted serving as agent and distributor, and received subscriptions. He endeavored to tell how much he made from this work, but thinks he stopped acting in this capacity in December (pp. 22 and 23). Alien knew that Marosz, the secretary of his branch, received from Chicago a charter therefor and had taken it away to have it framed (pp. 11, 16, and 39).

Alien denied he was a member of the Union of Russian Workers, but asserted that he once joined the Russian Workers' organization, but can't tell just when that was. Attention is invited to the questioning and answers on this feature, found on pages 17, 18, 19, 33, and 34. Exhibit C is a card in alien's name of membership in the Russian Workers' organization, with a seal on the outside bearing the date of September 30, 1917, and it contains inside under the heading "1919" several impressions of a stamp reading March 1, 1919. It is not known definitely to what the latter stamp referred, and alien did not throw any light upon it; but the record book of the financial secretary of the Russian Workers' organization, later the Union of Russian Workers, No. 1, of Baltimore, who was John Brunert, and who was deported on the Buford, shows alien as T. Truss, and paying 75 cents from October to December, 1917, and $3.45 through 1918 and $1 in March, 1919. Alien finally denied he made this last payment. On the premise that from these records alien at least had been a member of the Union of Russian Workers certain extracts from a translation of Nowimirsky—Manifesto of Anarchists-Communists—were read into the record and the entire translation entered as "Exhibit KK."

Alien admitted as his a receipt for $2.50 from the secretary-treasurer of the Workers' Defense Union, in this city, T. S. Wetter, who alien "guesses" is also the local organizer or secretary of the I. W. W. This receipt represented the sale of 25 buttons by the local of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, of which alien was chairman, to help some of their members who had been arrested because of their membership in the Union of Russian Workers last November (See "Exhibit D"). The Department of Justice found many circulars, books, pamphlets, etc., in alien's desk at his home, and one of them, "Exhibit E," is a blank from the executive secretary of the Communist Party, in Chicago, asking for subscriptions for the work of the party and detailing various purposes for which funds and contributions were needed. Alien is very vague and contradictory as to how he came to receive this circular, but said only one came (pp. 20, 21). On page 22 he identified four blank application cards for membership in the Communist Party found in his desk, and "Exhibit H" hereto, as having been received by him in a letter from Chicago.

Alien received a letter from some man in Chicago, whom he states he did not know (which, with translation and envelope, is "Exhibit J"), and which letter refers to the writer not being able to come to Baltimore to address alien's local. Alien stated on direct examination that this letter was received in the envelope referred to, which bears a notation in an upper left-hand corner "Polish S. S. P." and an address which later was the headquarters of the Communist Party of America. Alien defines these initials, etc., as the Polish Section, Socialist Party, and states he thinks this organization was transferred to the Communist Party. Alien later was not sure that this letter was received in the envelope he identified, and which is postmarked August 5, 1919, and which preceded by over a week Pinsky's address in this city (pp. 25, 40), alien having stated that he presumed Pinsky gave the writer of the letter alien's address. Other papers and books and pamphlets found in alien's home were likewise introduced as exhibits, some by me and some by alien's counsel. One circular in English, found with others in "Exhibit L," is a blank application for charter in the Communist Party of America, others in this exhibit in English being the well-known circular of said party, "Your Shop" and "Break the Blockade of Russia." Alien claimed he was holding these temporarily for the secretary, Marosz, who had handed them to him (p. 26).

Exhibit O is a book of blank receipts and stubs bearing the seal of a branch of the Industrial Workers of the World, to which alien belonged in this city several years ago. It was, so he said, for the purpose of noting receipts of money for the benefit of this organization, but alien claimed he made no collections. To his attorneys he said it was about eight years ago that he was a member of this order, and joined simply because the shop in which he was working then was organized in that union, but that he left this order when he ceased working in said shop.

Much questioning and controversy were based upon the paper which is Exhibit LL, a report from the files of the Department of Justice regarding alien's alleged presence at a meeting of some vaguely described organization on July 20 last, at which Truss was said to have been a speaker, and to have made certain declarations about his membership in the Union of Russian Workers at that time. Alien consistently denied having been at any such meeting or of having made the substance of the statement attributed to him therein. Counsel in the submitted brief criticized severely the introduction of this report, and intimate that it really does not pertain to their client. It seems to me that it should not receive consideration against the alien, as it is secondary and altogether hearsay evidence, and the agent who supposedly was present at the time was not produced or named by the Department of Justice. It was entered in the record for what worth it might be considered, which, in my opinion, is negligible.

To his attorney alien admitted, page 40, that he was many times in the meeting of his local branch here of the Communist Party. He made several guesses as to what month this branch, which he claims has become defunct, held its last meeting, finally saying it was in October. There is no proof of this other than alien's claim, and it is contravened by the fact that the secretary of the branch, Marosz, sent to the party headquarters in Chicago on October 13 for $6 worth of dues stamps and for the charter, and alien knows of this (p. 11), and one of the circulars printed in Polish, just preceding the blank application for charter, in Exhibit L, is dated October 28, and was found in alien's home.

Extraneous to matter directly connected with the warrant charges, counsel introduced several witnesses, including alien's wife and the pastor of the church in which he is an elder, to prove alien's good character, religious affiliation, peacable disposition, his love for this Government and its institutions, and his generosity in buying a Liberty bond, contributing to the Red Cross, and other patriotic activities. The witness, Rev. Paul Fox, testifying on pages 58 to 62, inclusive, related alien's connection with his church, and told that while alien did not attend the Americanization class in English, he has attended faithfully the general lectures which are intended to acquaint all the foreign citizens with our institutions. To me witness stated that these lectures in the Polish language have the same object in view as the Americanization English classes, and tell the people how they can become citizens of this country. That in these lectures, which Truss has attended, the hearers are told just how they could obtain information as to when they arrived in this country. Compare these statements with alien's testimony that in some past year, not definitely stated, he did apply for his first papers, but could not obtain them because of his ignorance of the exact date of his arrival in this country. Alien admitted that he knew that such information could be obtained in this office, where records of arrival at this port are filed; yet despite this knowledge, and what he has been hearing at the lectures at his church since 1910, he has made no serious attempt to declare his intention of becoming a citizen, thereby bringing into serious question his professed admiration and love for this Government.

To exemplify what may have been alien's real attitude toward our participation in the World War, I respectfully refer to the testimony of his wife, on page 29. She was justly proud of the fact that her brother had fought with the American Army in France and had died of wounds. When asked by counsel if the alien urged his brother-in-law to join or volunteer, Mrs. Truss stated that her husband said "If you join it, you know your parents are not in good condition; you might stay and help them." The next question of counsel was "Did Mr. Truss have anything to do with his joining?" the answer being in part, "He didn't have anything to do with it, but he told my brother not to join it because he would be killed." Counsel seemed to omit referring to this testimony, when dilating upon the alien's spirit of patriotism and Americanism.

Summing up, then, it would seem from the above analysis of testimony and exhibits, dispassionately, reasonably, and fairly, that both alien's membership in and affiliation with the Communist Party of America have been established. His acting as subscription agent and distributor of the Polish organ of the Communist Party would in itself evidence affiliation as distinguished from actual membership. It remains, then, to determine whether the Communist Party is one embraced within the language of the act of October 16, 1918. The extracts from the publications and proclamations of said party, read into the record, clearly prove, in my opinion, that this party does teach, advocate, and believe in the inimical doctrines detailed in the warrant of arrest. As a sequence, the warrant charges have been sufficiently established, and deportation is recommended.

Alien is at liberty under bail of $1,000.

(Signed) A. R. ARCHIBALD,
Immigrant Inspector.

This report from the Baltimore inspector is followed in the file by a memorandum for the Assistant Secretary, dated March 29, 1920, submitted to the Assistant Secretary without being submitted to the commissioner general, written by W. D. Davidge, a labor mediator and confidential investigator—acting under instructions of the Assistant Secretary—as law examiner in reviewing these cases. His recommendation does not represent the views of the commissioner general or of the Bureau of Immigration. It carries the clause "the bureau recommends that the warrant be canceled," but that is not signed by Commissioner General Caminetti.

Then, on April 6, Assistant Secretary Post canceled the warrant and issued the following memorandum:

APRIL 6, 1920.

For: Commissioner General of Immigration.
From: Assistant Secretary.
Subject: In re Thomas Truss, No. 54860/67.

This alien, a Pole by birth, is 33 years of age; he arrived in the United States in 1907; was married in 1912, and has three American-born children. He is a coat presser by occupation, earning about $40 a week, and is or recently was president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, of Baltimore. His character, well attested by highly responsible witnesses, is that of a man who is not in the slightest degree dangerous to this Government or at all inimical to any organized government, but who would make a good citizen of the United States. He was taken into custody on the 7th of January, 1920, by policemen who came to his home and asked him to accompany them for the purpose of answering questions. He complied, expecting to return presently. The policemen conducted him to a police station where they delivered him to the police official in charge, saying that he was wanted by a special agent of the Bureau of Investigation of the United States Department of Justice. Thereupon the alien was locked in a cell over night, and until some time during the next day his wife and friends were ignorant of his whereabouts. If there was any warrant for this arrest, the alien was not shown the warrant or in any other way informed of the reason or the authority for his summary imprisonment nor has any such authority been since disclosed. While still imprisoned he was examined on the 8th of January by a special agent of the Department of Justice, and his examination reduced to writing. No lawful authority for this proceeding was disclosed to the alien at the time, nor has any been disclosed since; no warning was given him that his replies might be used against him, and he was not informed of his right to have counsel present to represent him if he wished.

A special agent of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice thereupon made an affidavit in which he swore that in the course of his personal investigations and those of the officials and employees under his supervision and direction he was informed and verily believed that the alien was a subject of Russia; that he was a member of the Communist Party and the Union of Russian Workers; that these organizations advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, and that the alien was a member of and affiliated with them; that he was an anarchist, believed in and advocated the overthrow by force or violence of the Government and believed in and was opposed to all organized government. This affidavit was evidently a filled-out form, as the attorneys for the alien state; but inasmuch as the Secretary of Labor had already decided that the Union of Russian Workers and the Communist Party are within the proscription of the act of Congress of October 16, 1918, its averments imposed upon the immigrant inspector in charge at Baltimore the duty of applying to the Secretary of Labor for a warrant of arrest (see immigration rule 22, subdivision 3), and the Secretary of Labor was thereupon in duty bound to issue the warrant (see section 19 of the immigration act of 1917, and section 2 of the supplementary act of October 16, 1918).

Accordingly, on January 8, the alien being then still in custody at the police station in Baltimore, as stated above, the immigrant inspector in charge at Baltimore telegraphed to his superior officer at Washington that satisfactory probable cause had been shown against the alien for membership in the Union of Russian Workers and the Communist Party.

On the following day, January 9, a warrant of arrest was consequently issued by the Secretary of Labor and the inspector in charge at Baltimore was duly instructed by telegram to arrest the alien and hold him in bail in $1,000, the usual sum in such cases. In due course the formal warrant of arrest was transmitted to the inspector in charge at Baltimore, and on January 9, two days after the arrest described above, the alien was taken into the custody of the Department of Labor by the inspector in charge.

Prior thereto the Department of Labor was in no wise a participant in or directly or indirectly responsible for the arrest of the alien or his treatment in any respect. Subsequent, however, to January 9, and until he gave bail, on January 15, the alien remained in custody as a prisoner upon the aforesaid warrant of the Department of Labor. His hearing pursuant thereto began January 20, and on April 1 the record of hearing came to the Assistant Secretary for decision, pursuant to his authority under the immigration laws and the organic act of the Department of Labor.

Examination of this record makes it evident that alien is not a communist. Neither is he an anarchist. He is the opposite of an anarchist, namely, a socialist.

It also appears from the record that the alien came to the United States in 1907, has lived in Baltimore ever since, and has been for several years a respected member of and active worker for the St. Paul's Polish Church (Presbyterian) of Baltimore, in which he is an elder.

As to his membership in the I. W. W., a point of contention at the alien's hearings, the record shows that he was a member of a branch of that organization six years ago, this branch being then the only union of wage workers in his shop, but that he joined the Amalgamated Clothing Workers when it was organized and thereupon dropped out of the I. W. W.

The record also shows that alien was for a time a member of a Russian workers' organization, then an educational and mutual benefit society, having nothing to do with governmental problems. This organization merged into the Union of Russian Workers (an organization heretofore proscribed under the act of Oct. 16, 1918), whereupon the alien dropped his membership. He never became a member of the Union of Russian Workers.

The case appearing in the record against the alien turns, therefore, upon the question of his alleged membership in the Communist Party of America, which, like the Union of Russian Workers, is under the ban of the act of October 16, 1918. He is shown to have authorized the signing by another for him of a printed application for membership in the Communist Party. Inasmuch, however, as that signing was prior to the organization of the proscribed Communist Party of America, it is a nullity for the purpose of this proceeding unless confirmed by activities or declarations of the alien after the constitution of the proscribed Communist Party was adopted and brought to his attention.

According to the circumstances shown, alien's membership application was made in June, July, or August, 1919. The Communist Party of America was not organized until September. Alien had authorized his anteorganization application at the suggestion of an official organizer of the Socialist Party at a mass meeting which alien attended upon the organizer's invitation, and at which the organizer set on foot preliminary proceedings for organizing a local branch of the subsequently organized Communist Party. As alien understood him the new party was to stand for socialization of mines, railroads, etc., thereby lowering prices as the Government Post Office had lowered postage.

Such a branch was informally organized, and on September 5, the day of the organization of the Communist Party in Chicago, it applied for a charter. The application was approved by Communist Party officials at Chicago on September 14 and a membership card was given to the alien. Having previously paid a membership fee and two months' dues, the alien was credited with payments up to and including November. A charter was received by the secretary of the branch, but not accepted by the group. The reason for delay seems to have been that no constitution nor any explanation of the purpose of the new party had been received, although the informally organized branch had been promised the attendance of an organizer to explain the Communist Party to its members. At a meeting in October, no organizer having come nor any constitution of the party, and the members of the branch not having learned anything more about the organization than had been explained at the mass meeting held in Baltimore before the Communist Party was organized, alien's branch decided to have no more meetings and instructed the secretary to return the charter. Its members never got together again.

On the basis of those circumstances, the responsibility falls upon this department of deciding whether or not the alien comes within the membership clause of the act of Congress of October 16, 1918.

Under that clause aliens must be deported if "they are members of or affiliated with" the Communist Party of America. If this clause be construed as meaning that aliens who have once technically become members of the Communist Party must be deported even though they had no guilty knowledge, or that the principle of "once a member always a member" applies, it might be possible to spell out from the circumstances described above a membership for which deportation would be mandatory. Even then, however, there would be no little difficulty without disregarding every principle of personal responsibility. Having applied for membership before the proscribed organization was born, and withdrawn before its constitution was brought even perfunctorily to his attention, this alien would seem to a fair American mind to lack the requisites even of technical membership. If, however, the requisites of technical membership were all present, nevertheless the Congress of the United States should not hastily be presumed to have intended that resident aliens be arrested and deported as members of an unlawful organization, when all the circumstances show the alien himself to have been innocent of any guilty knowledge or motive in taking membership, and when it appears not only that he is and has been wholly free from any hostile purpose toward this Government, but that he is sympathetic with our democratic institutions.

Some members of Congress may possibly have intended, when they voted for this law, to have it construed in a narrow and un-American fashion; but it would not be reasonable to infer that Congress, as the constitutional law-making body of this country, enacted this law with any such un-American purpose. I shall therefore assume in this case, as I have in a large number of similar cases, that Congress intended the act of October 16, 1918, to be considered reasonably with reference to the individual knowledge and intent of persons drawn innocently into an unlawful membership.

If the act be so construed, this alien is not within the spirit of the act even if he were within its letter. In fact, however, he does not appear to be within its letter. Under the circumstances disclosed by the record he was never so much as a technical member of the proscribed Communist Party, and in so far as his conduct might be supposed to confirm his anteorganization application or to bring him within the affiliation clause of the act the circumstances of his withdrawal are conclusive.

I have described this case at length, because in most, if not all, essentials it is typical of a large proportion of fully 1,000 cases I have decided after hearings in which warrants of arrest had ben issued by the Department of Labor on prima facie proof of probable cause furnished by special agents of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice. The aliens are arrested and imprisoned, while imprisoned they are subjected to a police-office inquisition, an affidavit showing probable cause (upon information and belief) is thereupon presented to the Department of Labor, whereupon the Department of Labor issues its warrant of arrest, takes over the custody of the alien, as by law it is required to do, and proceeds as usual in warrant cases under the expulsion clause of the immigration law. When the hearings at immigration stations are reported verbatim in regular course to the Department of Labor, the Secretary of Labor (or his lawful representative), who is charged with the exclusive responsibility, comes to examine these records, it is found in a large proportion of the large number of cases I have examined that there is no better reason for deportation than is disclosed in the present case. In some cases the membership is "automatic," the arrested alien having been transferred from a lawful organization to the unlawful one by vote of a group or branch of the former and without his knowledge. In some cases he has had knowledge of the transfer, but none at all of the character of the organization to which he has been transferred. In other cases he has signed applications before the existence of the unlawful organization and has never confirmed his membership by any conscious act. Sometimes an organizer or a friend has signed the application for him. As a rule, the hearings show the aliens arrested to be workingmen of good character who have never been arrested before, who are not anarchists or revolutionists, nor politically or otherwise dangerous in any sense. Many of them, as in this case, have American-born children. It is pitiful to consider the hardships to which they and their families have been subjected during the past three or four months by arbitrary arrest, long detention in default of bail beyond the means of hard-working wage earners to give, for nothing more dangerous than affiliating with friends of their own race, country, and language, and without the slightest indication of sinister motive or any unlawful act within their knowledge or intention. To permit aliens to violate the hospitality of this country by conspiring against it is something which no American can contemplate with patience. Equally impatient, however, must any patriotic American be with drastic proceedings on flimsy proof to deport aliens who are not conspiring against our laws and do not intend to. Although these are not criminal proceedings, being wholly administrative in their character, their effect upon the innocent individual who in this summary way is found to be guilty is as distressing to him and his family, to his friends, and to his neighbors as the effect of conviction for crime by regular judicial processes.

It is sometimes difficult to draw the line in the records of cases of aliens charged with membership in a proscribed organization—and very few cases so far instituted upon probable cause shown by special agents of the Bureau of Investigation are for anything else—between those who are members understandingly, and those whose membership is only technical, and without guilty knowledge on their part. The natural association of alien residents with their own countrymen and the overlapping social, industrial, and political organizations, each with its factions, tend to confuse the circumstances. As a guide through this maze, I have tried to follow the following principles of decision in each individual case:

1. The Communist Party of America is within the membership clauses of the act of October 16, 1918 (Secretary's memorandum in the Preis case).

2. Personal signing of the application for membership required by the Communist Party as quoted in the Secretary's memorandum in the Preis case, when such signing is supplemented by circumstances indicating membership subsequent to the creation of the Communist Party, constitutes membership within the purview of the act of October 16, 1918.

3. Signing by another with the authority of the alleged member has the same effect as personal signing, provided authority to sign and understanding of the purpose thereof are proved.

4. Applications for membership not confirmed by acceptance do not constitute membership within the act of October 16, 1918, unless it may be inferred from further facts indicative thereof.

5. Name in a membership list is not in itself proof of membership.

6. "Automatic membership" does not constitute membership within the act of October 16, 1918, unless supported by proof of individual activities or declarations tending to show knowledge of the character of the organization.

7. Signed applications antedating the formation of the Communist Party (on or about September 5, 1919), which are not unlawful in their own terms or their legitimate implications, do not in themselves constitute proof of membership nor of application for membership in the prescribed Communist Party.

8. When membership has been withdrawn under circumstances satisfactorily establishing good faith, the accused alien does not come within the proscriptions of the act of October 16, 1918, as to membership.

9. When the accused alien appears to be a person of good general character, fit for American citizenship except for the accusation in hand, and there is reasonable doubt of his membership, the warrant of arrest will be canceled.

10. Statements of the accused alien, whether oral or in writing made while he is in custody and without opportunity fairly afforded him from the beginning to be represented by counsel, and without clear warning that anything he says may be used against him will be disregarded pursuant to the principle re Jackson (U. S. District Court for Montana, Bourquin, J.) and of Silverthrone v. United States (Jan. 28, 1920), as having been unlawfully obtained.

11. Exhibits seized upon the premises or the person of the accused alien without lawful process will be disregarded pursuant both to the principle and the precise decision in re Jackson and Silvertone v. United States.

12. In cases in which the alien is the father of children born in the United States, and therefore constitutional American citizens, and who are dependent upon and receive from him parental support, every fair doubt regarding membership within the purview of the statute will be accorded.

Guided by those principles, I am of opinion that upon the record in this case the alien is not a member of or affiliated with the Communist Party or any other prescribed organization within the meaning of the act of Congress of October 16, 1918.

The warrant is canceled.

LOUIS F. POST, Assistant Secretary.

Then the file in the proceedings against Thomas Truss comes to an end with a pathetic memorandum from the law division, as follows:

APRIL 9, 1920.

Mr. CAMINETTI:

I have read the memorandum of the Assistant Secretary. It leaves little hope for the rest of the cases. However, we can still recommend in accordance with what we conceive the law to be.

There is nothing further for the law division to do in the case (unless you wish to make reply to the memorandum) and it should go to the Cor. Sec. for decision and the usual letters.

W. W. P.

Mr. Speaker, the case of Thomas Truss is presumably the least offensive that the Assistant Secretary could find among all the arrested alien communists. The hundreds of others fall on that decision.

Further, "rules of guidance" Nos. 10 and 11, in the Assistant Secretary's memorandum, make it practically impossible to prove cases against alien revolutionists, anarchists, and enemies of this Government.

Many other papers show just how Commissioner General Caminetti recommends deportation in these cases, after review by his law examiners, how Assistant Secretary Post orders cancellation, and how the Commissioner General of Immigration, or his law clerk, then is obliged to write memorandums in accordance with the views of the Assistant Secretary, cancellation of the deportation warrant follows, and the alien is free. The radicals, both native and alien, are organized as never before. They defend each other. It makes no difference to what particular organization they belong or what they call themselves. Anarchists, communists, syndicalists—they are all the same. They connive day and night for the same thing. They know what they want—revolution by force.

Under such conditions it is too bad that the United States under its laws can not send away from its shores those aliens who are here for the purpose of destroying this Government.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that April 10 they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 685. An act for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls;

H. R. 687. An act for the relief of Frank Pinkley;

H. R. 6077. An act for the relief of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif.;

H. R. 8645. An act for the relief of Lawrence Bendich and Anthony Vezich; and

H. R. 11175. An act for the public sale of customhouse building and site at Kennebunkport, Me.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Joint Committee on Printing, of which I have the honor to be the vice chairman, I have transmitted to the Speaker, for submission to the House of Representatives, the report of the Joint Committee on Printing on Government periodicals and field printing for the year ended March 1, 1920, in compliance with section 11 of Public Act No. 314, Sixty-fifth Congress.

The report contains a detailed statement filling 105 printed pages of the activities of the Joint Committee on Printing during the past year, but its work may be summarized as follows:

A careful investigation was made of 266 journals, magazines, and periodicals, which the committee ascertained were being published by various branches of the Government service at a cost of approximately $2,500,000 per annum. As a result of this investigation and the regulations adopted by the committee, 111 of these periodicals, which cost approximately $1,200,000 per annum, have been discontinued.

During the year the committee received requests for field printing authorizations to the amount of $2,079,200, of which it approved $1,181,100, making a net reduction of $898,100 in the amount asked by the various branches of the Government service.

The committee also investigated 287 printing plants which were maintained in the various branches of the Government service for printing and binding in addition to that procured from the Government Printing Office or purchased from commercial printers. The equipment of these plants cost approximately $1,000,000 and includes 500 presses, nearly two score typesetting machines, as well as vast quantities of other printing and binding equipment. These plants, which are scattered all over the United States, employ more than 800 men at an annual wage of approximately $600,000.

Quite a number of field plants have been discontinued as a result of the committee's efforts to centralize as much printing as possible in the Government Printing Office, and it is expected that there will be a further material reduction in the number of these plants the coming year.

In addition to the foregoing activities, as required by the act of March 1, 1919, the committee has devoted much time the past year to its duties as a board of directors for the Government Printing Office, including direct supervision over the standardizing, purchase, and inspection of more than $5,000,000 worth of paper and other material annually for that great establishment.

Owing to extraordinary market and manufacturing conditions brought about by the war, it has been almost impossible to obtain paper for the Government Printing Office by contract at anything like a reasonable price. The committee therefore directed the Public Printer to buy nearly all the vast quantities required for war printing in the open market at the lowest competitive prices quoted at the time for suitable stock. This procedure has greatly increased the detail work of the committee, as each proposed purchase has to be examined and passed upon. Such transactions number several thousand in the course of a year.

SAVING IN PAPER PURCHASES.

The judgment of the committee in refusing to enter into annual contracts for paper during the critical war period and in directing the Public Printer to buy his stock in the open market at current prices proved to be most profitable for the Government. When the committee opened the bids for one year during the war it decided that the prices quoted for annual contracts were entirely too high and rejected all of the proposals at that time. As a result, paper for the year was bought in the open market from time to time, thereby effecting an actual saving to the Government of $846,278.14, according to a comparison by the Public Printer with what the same paper would have cost had the bids for annual contracts been accepted by the committee.

By a careful supervision over the open-market purchases, the committee has also been able to effect additional savings in the expenditures for paper. For example, in November, 1919, the committee disapproved the bids then submitted for some 4,000,000 pounds of print paper and directed the Public Printer to solicit new proposals. Much lower prices were then obtained and the paper was bought at a net savings of $52,000 on this purchase alone.

As is well known, the scarcity of paper and its abnormal price have vitally affected the printing business during the war. Many times it has been almost impossible to get paper at any price. This situation, coupled with the enormous requirements for paper by the war activities of the Government and its extravagant use by the various publicity and propaganda bureaus, has made the work of the committee most difficult and trying, but it is believed the record proves that its efforts to effect economies have been highly successful even under such adverse conditions.

Further evidence of the economies that have resulted from the committee's supervision over the public printing and binding is contained in a comparative statement prepared by the Public Printer covering production in the Government Printing Office for the eight months of ths fiscal years 1919 and 1920, bringing the comparison up to March 1, 1920.

This statement shows that the computed product of the Government Printing Office for the eight months of the present fiscal year decreased almost a million dollars. During the first eight months of the fiscal year 1919 the computed product amounted to $8,060,169.95, while for the first eight months of the fiscal year 1920 the computed product amounted to $7,065,373.08, or a decrease of $994,796.87. The Public Printer states that this was due largely to the material decrease in "edition" work, which is shown by the following figures comparing the first eight months of the fiscal year 1919 with the same period of the fiscal year 1920:

In 1919 the total number of sheets folded in pamphlet binding section was 180,373,682 as compared with 152,372,964 for 1920, or a decrease of 28,000,718. The number of signatures sewed, which indicates the edition work of the bindery, for the eight months of 1919 was 91,388,080 as compared with 67,993,510 for 1920, or a decrease of 23,394,570. The number of cases made, which indicates the number of books bound, for the eight months of 1919 was 2,992,188 as compared with 1,612,870 for 1920, or a decrease of 1,379,318.

There was a marked decrease also in the printing for the fiscal year 1919 from that done in the fiscal year 1918. In the fiscal year 1918 the Government Printing Office charged for a total of 8,509,053,764 printed pages, as compared with 6,932,259,276 for the fiscal year 1919, or a decrease for the year of 1,576,794,488. For the fiscal year 1918 the number of bound publications was 4,395,461, as compared with 3,465,229 in the fiscal year 1919, or a decrease in the bound publications for the year of 930,232.

This material decrease in the product of the Government Printing Office has had a marked effect also on the quantity of print paper used by that establishment. For the first eight months of the fiscal year 1920, ending March 1, 1920, the Public Printer reports charges for paper (including envelopes) entering into the product of the Government Printing Office at $2,206,734.38, as compared with charges of $3,114,919.10 for the first eight months of 1919. This shows a decrease of $908,184.72 in the paper used for Government printing during the present fiscal year, although the price of paper has greatly increased during the same period.

For the eight months of 1919 paper represented 39 per cent of the total printing charges, while for the eight months of 1920 it represents only 33 per cent, or a decrease of 6 per cent. For the entire fiscal year 1919 the charges for paper going into the product of the Government Printing Office amounted to $4,679,177.16, as compared with $4,753,924.58 for the fiscal year 1918, which, due to war requirements, represented the largest quantity of paper ever used by the Government Printing Office in any year of its history. The decrease in 1919 from that of 1918 was $74,747.42. The further decrease of $900,000 for the first eight months of the present fiscal year indicates the progress that is being made by the Government in its economies in the use of paper.

INVESTIGATIONS BY COMMITTEE.

The committee also has made considerable progress in the following investigations, which it hopes will result in substantial economies, particularly in the use of print paper by the Government:

1. Investigation of publications and other printed matter sent to Members of Congress by various governmental agencies. This inquiry has disclosed a large waste in such publications. Members of Congress have appealed to the committee for relief from the flood of useless printed matter that the departments are constantly pouring down upon them. The departments have been requested, therefore, to revise all their regular mailing lists at least once a year by making inquiry as to whether the publications so distributed are desired by the persons receiving them. The committee found that many mailing lists had not been revised for years, and that consequently a large percentage of the publications was wasted by useless distribution.

2. An urgent request has been made to the heads of departments to immediately cooperate with the committee in conserving the print paper by suspending, at least temporarily, many Government publications that are not essential at this time. This request has not brought forth the response that the committee had hoped would come from the departments. The continued shortage of paper makes it imperative that a number of the less important publications of the Government shall be suspended, at least for a time, or else the Government Printing Office will soon have no paper for even printing which is absolutely necessary to the transaction of public business. Some of the departments have rushed ahead in their mad orgy of printing, utterly regardless of this situation and unmindful of the public demand that such extravagances must soon cease. The committee is preparing, therefore, to order the suspension of an additional number of publications unless the departments themselves take prompt steps to curtail unnecessary printing and check the great waste of paper by their useless propaganda bureaus.

3. Investigation of the use of mimeograph, multigraph, and other duplicating devices by the various branches of the Government in the production of vast quantities of publicity propaganda and printing. Many thousands of dollars have been invested in such equipment by the departments in Washington alone, and these duplicating devices have to a large extent taken the place of the branch printing offices which Congress abolished a number of years ago. A separate report on this subject will be submitted later.

4. Investigation of addresses and speeches printed at the Government Printing Office for Government officers and charged to appropriations for the various executive departments and independent establishments of the Government from July 1, 1916, to September 15, 1919. The total number of speeches thus printed at public expense for Government officers other than Members of Congress was 30,144,362 copies, which required 894,101 pounds of white print paper and 557,683 pounds of manila envelope paper, or a total of 1,451,784 pounds of paper.

The printing of these speeches cost the Government $109,066.35. The envelopes used for mailing them at Government expense cost $84,052.96. The estimated expense of addressing these envelopes and inclosing the speeches was $97,968. The estimated expense to the Postal Service for handling and transporting the 725 tons of mail matter was $151,711.42. The total expense to the Government for printing and distributing the speeches of the Government officials who made this use of public funds was $442,798.73.

In addition to the foregoing, 3,031,137 speeches and addresses by Government officers other than Members of Congress were printed and charged to congressional funds or paid for by Members of Congress during the period from July 1, 1916, to January 1, 1920. The cost of printing the speeches was $12,610.66. The estimated cost to the Government of envelopes furnished free for the distribution of these speeches was $7,274.83.

In connection with the printing at public expense of these speeches, none of which were made by Members of Congress, it should be stated that Members of Congress are required to pay out of their own funds not less than the actual cost of such printing ordered by them from the Public Printer, so that the Government is fully reimbursed for the printing of speeches for Members of Congress. The committee is of the opinion, therefore, that other officers of the Government should not be permitted to have their speeches printed at public expense for general distribution, and that the gross abuse revealed by this investigation cease.

5. Investigation of the furnishing of large quantities of Government publications to private individuals and agencies, the distribution of which has been a valuable asset to such individuals and agencies. The committee ascertained that from January 5, 1918, to February 19, 1920, 1,319,495 Government publications were furnished free to one individual alone by order of three establishments of the Government—the Department of Agriculture, the Public Health Service, and the Bureau of Mines. The greater portion of these publications was thus disposed of in lots of from 5,000 to 10,000 copies of each. The individual referred to conducts an extensive newspaper service in which the distribution of Government publications forms a conspicuous part. The plan is to advise readers of the newspapers represented by this correspondent to write to him for copies of any desired publication, inclosing a 2-cent stamp, upon receipt of which the publication is sent out from the Washington office of the correspondent. In this way one individual, during the past two years, took over the distribution of nearly a million and a half publications which it was the duty of officers of the Government to distribute. The committee has no knowledge as to what profit, if any, these publications have been to the individual in question; but the committee did come to the conclusion that the furnishing of such a vast quantity of publications printed at Government expense to a private individual or agency was highly improper, and therefore adopted the following resolution, which is intended to prevent a continuance of such practice:

Resolved by the Joint Committee on Printing, under authority of section 11 of Public Act No. 314, Sixty-fifth Congress, That no person connected with any department of the Government shall furnish any publication for free distribution to any private individual, corporation, or agency in lots to exceed 50 copies, without first making application to the Joint Committee on Printing, giving the name of the person or agency desiring the same, the name of the publication, and the number of copies desired: Provided, That this regulation shall not apply to publications which are sold at a price to cover the cost of same: Provided further, That the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing be instructed to furnish to each department of the Government and to the Public Printer a copy of this resolution, with a request that the receipt of same be duly acknowledged.

As a result of these investigations, the committee is firmly of the opinion that the act of March 1, 1919, which was adopted by Congress on the recommendation of this committee, was a most effective step toward substantial and much-needed economies in the public printing and binding. It is regrettable that some departments of the Government, particularly the War and Post Office Departments, made a vigorous effort to have this legislation repealed almost as soon as the law was enacted and before there was an opportunity to accomplish any of the ecenomies it contemplated.

A year's experience in the application of the law has convinced the committee that it was most timely and that the savings set forth herein are but a substantial beginning of the economies that may be brought about by continuing the supervision which has been vested in this committee.

The committee urgently recommends, therefore, that Congress reject all efforts to nullify or amend the act of March 1, 1919, in its application to any particular branch of the Government service.

The committee further recommends that it be given general supervision over all Government publications so as to bring about much needed coordination in Government printing, and that the committee be empowered to pass on the publication or discontinuance of all Government journals, magazines, and periodicals from time to time instead of having the same specifically provided for by law. It is believed this supervision should be vested in some body not connected with any particular department of the Government, and, from the work it has already done in this connection, the committee is of the opinion that the authority may as well be intrusted to it as to any other governmental agency.

PRINTING ECONOMIES OF CONGRESS.

It seems proper to state here that Congress and this committee have not undertaken to enforce printing economies on other branches of the Government without first effecting substantial saving in its own expenditures for that purpose. By direction of the committee the editions of documents printed for congressional distribution have been greatly restricted, and in many instances such distribution has been entirely suspended. The shortage and high price of paper and the necessity of utilizing the Government Printing Office to its utmost capacity for vital war work, prompted the committee to meet the situation as far as possible by curtailing congressional publications. The committee felt confident that the Members of Congress would give their approval to this patriotic purpose, and in this the committee has not been disappointed. The committee desires to express here and now its sincere appreciation of the hearty cooperation and support it has received from all the Members of Congress, who have accepted great reductions in the number of publications to which they are entitled without complaint or criticism.

The public is entitled to know that the failure of Members of Congress to distribute as many Government publications during the last two years has not been due to any negligence or lack of interest on their part, but has been the result of this committee's action, necessitated by war conditions, in suspending the printing of thousands upon thousands of copies of these publications. If such radical steps had not been taken by the committee, the Government Printing Office would not have been able to render the splendid war service it did, especially in the printing of the millions of publications so necessary to the success of the draft and the conduct of military operations. The committee believes, therefore, that this record fully justifies the means adopted.

The law (34 Stats. L., 826) provides that congressional publications, even though the total number is designated, shall be printed in such editions as the Joint Committee on Printing may determine, and that subsequent editions shall be printed as directed by the committee. The committee accordingly took advantage of this provision to effect the economies that were absolutely required of it by war conditions and the paper shortage. The committee anticipated somewhat the situation that it felt was sure to result from the war, and since October 6, 1914, has not ordered a single reprint for distribution by Members through the Senate and House folding rooms.

Just what this means to Members of Congress may be appreciated by citing as an example the Agricultural Yearbook. The full number of copies authorized by law for congressional distribution is 470,000 a year. Under the committee's regulations only 380,000 copies are regularly printed as the first edition, and since 1914 the committee has of necessity declined to permit any reprints, thus effecting a saving of 90,000 yearbooks annually for the last five years. As it costs about 75 cents apiece to print these books, the actual saving on this one item alone for the five years has been $337,500. The committee greatly regrets that Members and the public have been deprived of their full quota of yearbooks, but it believes such an economy will be commended by all who are interested in reducing the expenditures of the Government at this time of high costs and burdensome taxation.

This marked reduction in congressional printing became fully effective the past year and, together with the prior restriction on editions of other publications, has already saved many million pounds of precious paper besides effecting an economy of thousands upon thousands of dollars in the public printing and binding. A detailed statement in this regard is now being prepared for the committee.

PRINTING-REFORM BILL.

The committee also felt justified in the application of these economies to the present emergency by the fact that it was merely putting into effect similar provisions of which the Senate and the House at one time or another have given their approval when the printing-reform bills have been under consideration. Substantially all the publications suspended for congressional distribution are similarly disposed of in the printing bill (H. R. 8362) which I introduced in the House on behalf of the committee as its vice chairman and which was passed without opposition by this body on August 13, 1919. The bill is now pending before the Senate Committee on Printing.

The printing bill, including the economies already undertaken by this committee, will make it possible to reduce the expenditures for printing and binding by $507,581.80 a year, according to a detailed statement included in the report on that measure (H. Rept. 227, 66th Cong.). The Joint Committee on Printing fully concurs in that report and urges that the bill be enacted into law at an early date.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article from the Sunday Washington Star, entitled "No lopsided repeal of the organic act," which is a brief discussion from their standpoint of the half-and-half tax, and the view that they are representing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the article from the Sunday Star to which he has referred. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an argument which I attempted to make before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House with reference to legislation on the soldiers' bonus.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an argument made before the Ways and Means Committee on the soldiers' bonus. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN WAR DEPARTMENT CONTRACTS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 517.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. Res. 515 and House Report No. 816 accompanying said resolution from the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. That there shall be not to exceed four hours of general debate on said resolution and report, one-half to be controlled by the chairman of said committee, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, and one-half by the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. DOREMUS. That the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MCKENZIE, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MCCULLOCH, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. DOREMUS, shall have leave to revise and extend their remarks on said resolution and report in the RECORD. That at the conclusion of the general debate the vote shall be taken on one substitute for the resolution, if any be offered, That upon the conclusion of the vote on said substitute and resolution in committee the committee shall rise and report the resolution or substitute, as the case may be, to the House; whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution or substitute to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am moving the previous question to allow 20 minutes' debate on a side.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now I yield for a question to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to inquire of the gentleman about the mysterious proposition in there that three certain gentlemen shall have the right to extend their remarks while the rest of us are shut out.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The provision in the rule is to allow gentlemen who have been on the subcommittee making this investigation, and who are especially prepared to discuss it, to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why do you specify three men to have this privilege?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For the reason that on a former occasion unanimous consent was refused to permit gentlemen to make proper corrections in the remarks they had made on the subject presented.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think anybody in the House could be found who would object to these three men extending their remarks.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That has been done, and this provision was put in to enable a complete record on the subject these gentlemen have so thoroughly investigated and are prepared to discuss.

Mr. FLOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has objection to other members of the committee extending their remarks? There are other members of this investigating committee who are not on the subcommittee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The other members of the committee are dealing with subjects on other subcommittees, and are not especially prepared, as I understand it, on this subject. The gentlemen named, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], are familiar with the subject matter of this report and resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. Some of us have been endeavoring to familiarize ourselves with it. Of course we could not possibly have the information that the three gentlemen named in the rule have, but we wanted to familiarize ourselves as well as we could with the conditions, and we might desire to extend our remarks.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman from Virginia desires time, I suggest he make application to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] for it, or ask to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FLOOD. I am not referring to the question of time. I am referring to the right to revise and extend the remarks I shall make in the time given me by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That will undoubtedly be granted by the House and is not barred by this rule.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. FESS. The three gentlemen have prepared their remarks, and if they take the time to put all they want to say in the RECORD other persons will be shut out entirely in the debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BEE. I understood the gentleman from Kansas to say that this was done once before?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. On a former occasion a member of the committee asked leave to revise and extend, and objection was made to the request.

Mr. BEE. I mean in the rule. Once before they had a rule that limited the gentlemen who could extend their remarks. Was it not the same character of a resolution that we now have before us, something affecting the expenditures in the War Department, and are these not the only two instances at this session where gentlemen have been named who only should be allowed to extend their remarks, and is there any especial sanctity as to their investigation of the War Department that they should have a right that other Members do not have?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is not a question of sanctity. It is a question of procedure of the House. Objection was made to the request of a Member of the House who had discussed the subject of war expenditures to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GARD. Is there any provision in the rule for any amendment to be offered?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. One amendment may be offered.

Mr. GARD. By way of substitute?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Which is the only amendment that can be offered?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The only amendment. And if the gentleman will read the resolution, I doubt if he would even offer a substitute.

Mr. Speaker, the rule is fair to both sides of the House. It brings before the House for consideration the report of the committee on camps and cantonments. The committee has offered a resolution making certain recommendations, which will be voted upon at the conclusion of the debate provided for in the rule. The resolution itself, I assume, will be discussed by gentlemen who are familiar with the subject. It provides that matters bordering on the criminal, if, indeed, they have not violated the statutes, should be referred to the office of the Attorney General.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman state when the resolution, not the rule, was presented here?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not sure. I found it on my desk this morning. It was introduced on April 10.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. April 10.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That was Saturday.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. What opportunity does the gentleman think has been given to the membership of the House to consider that resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, from Saturday until Monday.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does the gentleman think that is the proper method of procedure, to have a resolution brought in here on the 10th and considered under a rule that is presented here this moment?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If I did not think so, I would not have brought in this rule.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does the gentleman think that, as a system, is a good way of conducting the business of this House?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think so.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman is at variance with the opinion I understood him to have expressed last summer, when he thought some means ought to be found to give the House a little notice in advance of business to be transacted and when it is to be transacted. I do not think I misunderstood my friend's expression at that time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes, for a short question.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas whether or not there is anything in this resolution that will protect the millions of helpless women and little children who are now threatened with starvation in the United States? Is there anything to relieve that situation that now confronts the country? That is the livest question before us just now.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This deals with officers and agents of the United States Government contractors, who the committee think have been robbing these women and children of whom the gentleman from Texas speaks, and it suggests that the cases of these officers and others be referred to the Attorney General for proper treatment.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman realizes, however, that New York to-day is threatened with starvation inside of 10 days unless help is granted. Are we not going to take some action that will relieve that situation?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That question is not under consideration to-day in the House, but is a proper matter for the Attorney General to take up at once.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I propose to introduce a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to consider the great mass of war statutes under which we live and which we ineffectively dealt with the other day when the so-called peace resolution was considered, and when we undertake the consideration of it I do hope that my distinguished friend will give some attention to that resolution and deal with it, if he can, in a summary way.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I shall be happy to cooperate with the gentleman from Virginia in terminating the war powers of the President, if they have not already terminated.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am going to give the House an opportunity to do that.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to disagree with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE]. I think we disposed of the war laws very effectively last Friday.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Has the gentleman any information that the Senate has disposed of the so-called peace resolution or will do it?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not answer to that effect until the resolution is passed by the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I can not have any more of this discussion taken out of my time.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will yield for a short question.

Mr. WINGO. Under the rules and practice of the House, which control extensions of remarks, any Member can submit his request. Now, this special rule having undertaken to control extensions, has the gentleman contemplated the fact that his rule has limited the right of extension and revision, and it would be out of order to submit a request for somebody else under the rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is recognized.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the House is called upon to consider another chapter in the investigation which has been in progress by the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. This is a somewhat peculiar resolution. As has been pointed out, it designates three gentlemen who are to be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD. This is another bad precedent. The House set this precedent on a former occasion, if I remember correctly, and this is to be a second time that procedure is to be followed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the three men who discuss this proposition ought to have the right to extend and revise their remarks on the subject?

Mr. POU. I do not think that these three gentlemen should have any more privileges under the rules of the House than any other Members of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will agree with the gentleman about that, that that may be true. But the gentleman will also concede, I think, that in view of the fact that these gentlemen come from his committee objection might be made to their extending remarks that would not be made to other gentlemen on the floor of this House.

Mr. POU. I do not concede anything of the kind, Mr. Speaker, and I submit that it is bad procedure to designate three members of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and to give them privileges by a rule of the House that are withheld from other Members.

Every Member should stand on equality with every other Member in asking to extend his remarks. And this is not good procedure; and the sooner the House puts an end to the practice the better it will be.

Now, there is another peculiarity about this rule we are considering. It does not provide that there shall be a vote on House resolution 515. There is no provision of that kind. But it provides that if a vote is taken at all, it must be on the substitute.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, I submit to my friend, the gentleman from North Carolina, that if he will read lines 2 and 3 on page 2 of the rule he will find that there will be a vote on the question.

Mr. POU. I will say to my good friend from Kansas that I have read those lines and all other lines in this resolution. The House gets its warrant for action from this rule. You may do whatever this rule authorizes, and you may not do anything else. And here is what the rule says:

> That at the conclusion of the general debate the vote shall be taken on one substitute for the resolution if any be offered.

And that is all you are empowered to do. It does read that "upon the conclusion of the vote on said substitute and resolution," which would seem to infer that a vote had been taken on the original resolution, but there is no authority in this rule for taking a vote on anything but the substitute. Lex ita scripta. You yourself have written your law of procedure that way. It may be that you did not intend that it should read that way, but that is what you have done. So the House must vote on the substitute, and if you vote on the resolution you do something this rule does not authorize you to do, except by implication.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for the consideration of House resolution 515, and House resolution 515, as has been pointed out by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], was only introduced on April 10. There is no favorable report on it from any committee. I read on the back it was referred to the House Calendar. So without any report from any committee, without any consideration by any committee, the special rule we are considering directs by implication only that this resolution 515 shall be either voted up or voted down.

That may be good procedure, but it has remained for this House to adopt such procedure. So far as I recollect no House of Representatives of any former Congress ever did anything of the kind.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman tell us how we can intelligently vote on this resolution unless we have some report of the committee from which it is presented?

Mr. POU. I would not like to attempt to answer that question, because the rule is so peculiar that I must leave my friend to work out in his own ingenious mind the answer to his own question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this report is the building of our war cantonments. You are criticizing the cost-plus system that was resorted to by the War Department. If there is one achievement that stands out above any other on this side of the water in the winning of this war it is that achievement that made these cantonments ready in time to train our soldiers, to send them across the sea. [Applause.] And I imagine that any man who investigates this testimony will come to the conclusion that it was not a question of choice with the War Department, but that the War Department adopted the only means by which these cantonments could have been put in readiness to take care of the boys before they were sent across the sea. Every fair-minded man will, I think, admit that in all the investigations in progress by your several committees up to this good hour, no outstanding scandal in this war has been developed. Whenever you discover that there is anything really rotten in Denmark, you will not have to debate it four hours in the House. The newspapers of the country will take care of it. In the Spanish-American War it was not necessary to inaugurate an investigation to prove that the soldiers were fed upon rotten beef. It was not necessary to debate here for four or five hours the treatment of our soldiers in that war. The whole country knew that they were dying like flies over in Cuba from diseases which could have been easily prevented if somebody had not been remiss in doing his duty. So whenever you discover that any particular man has violated the law you will not have to inaugurate an investigation here. He will immediately be marked by the people of the country. He will immediately be prosecuted by the Department of Justice, and you will not have to waste four hours in useless debate. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. May I have two minutes?

Mr. POU. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, we have before us this rule, which is contained in House resolution 517. By reference to it you find that it was introduced on April 10. It is for the purpose of allowing the consideration of House resolution 515. The report on that resolution was made on April 10. So you see that the rule is of the same date—Saturday last—as the report upon the resolution.

But the point to which I want to invite attention is this: Lines 10 to 14, inclusive, in House resolution 517 provide—

> That the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MCKENZIE, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MCCULLOCH, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. DOREMUS, shall have leave to revise and extend their remarks on said resolution and report in the RECORD.

That is put in here for no other purpose than to allow remarks to be revised and extended so as to put in the RECORD newspaper clippings, ex parte statements, and all sorts of rubbish, in order that it may be franked out as campaign material in this presidential year. Now, we might as well look it straight in the face. That is the only purpose of doing it, and that is exactly what it is intended to be used for. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from North Carolina use some more of his time?

Mr. POU. I think that is the conclusion of the debate on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, unusual concern is expressed here by the gentleman on the Rules Committee representing the Democratic side, because we are giving to three men the privilege to extend their remarks without asking for that privilege from the floor of the House, which is the usual method and which will be employed by other Members who speak from the floor.

It has been stated before that the purpose of this is to allow the men who have made a thorough investigation and have reduced their argument to form to place it in the RECORD as they have produced it, which otherwise could be prevented by any Member on the floor of the House by simply objecting.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman from Ohio believe that there is one man on the floor of this House who would object to either one of these three gentlemen named extending his remarks for the very reason that he himself states?

Mr. FESS. Unfortunately I have to say that I have a fear of that, because it was done once before. Among the 435 Members there might be a very odd angle of view by certain Members of the House, and this is to prevent any one Member refusing to these gentlemen the privilege of extending their remarks as those remarks have been prepared.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not believe anybody would object to their extending their remarks. The gentleman says this is going to be the line of procedure hereafter. It never was done but once before, and I catechised the gentleman from Kansas about it then. If you can do it under one rule and force it through here, you can do it under any rule, and say that Tom, Dick, and Harry shall be permitted to extend his remarks, but that the rest of us shall be shut off.

Mr. FESS. The rest of us will not be shut off unless some individual Member of the House shuts us off by objecting. We permit any individual Member to shut off other Members, but we do not permit any Member to shut off these three men who have prepared their arguments, that we want to have printed as they are written.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman recalls that on one of the reports from one of the subcommittees the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. JEFFERIS], a member of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], another member of the committee, and the chairman of the main committee asked the privilege of extending their remarks for the purpose of apprising the American people of the facts that they had developed, when time did not permit them to speak at length from the floor, and objection was made in that case.

Mr. FESS. I remember that fact.

Mr. REAVIS. Is it not the purpose of the Rules Committee, by permitting all the members of the committee, Democrats and Republicans alike, to extend their remarks, to see that all the facts as developed by that committee get to the people of the United States?

Mr. FESS. That is the situation that led to the adoption of this rule.

At the opening of this war every Member who had an open mind knew that if the war would become extensive, as everybody expected it to become, there would be an immense amount of waste, because that is war, and if not managed under some degree of regard for the Treasury, extravagance would become the inevitable rule. The very first step taken to avoid this certainty was by the Republican membership of this House, when immediately after providing for the man power and money power of this Nation to prosecute the war, we sought to insure against needless extravagance and waste of funds. Our next step was to take the precaution to prevent the unnecessary waste in the expenditures for war by creating a committee of Congress on expenditures for war purposes. We saw our national debt increased overnight from less than a billion to over ten billions, and much more to follow, and in order to prevent unnecessary waste the Republican side of the House undertook the appointment of a committee on war expenditures—mark you, not a committee on the conduct of the war, as was the case in the Civil War—not as was attempted during the Civil War, when the Democratic side of the House undertook to interfere in the prosecution of the war, which they condemned and tried to hinder—but in the interest of seeing that there was no needless waste of the Nation's resources. The body that was supplying funds desired to provide against the waste of those funds. Those who fought against it, on the basis that we were interfering in the conduct of the war, failed to discriminate between the conduct of the war, which was the function of the Executive, conceded by every Republican in the House, and the expenditures of money appropriated by Congress. The body that appropriated the money must see that it is applied in accordance with the terms of the law.

What is the result? The moment we introduced that resolution there came an order from the White House that it was an attempt to interfere in the prosecution of the war, and we were defeated. This was not the first suggestion that the war was to be made a Democratic Party war. A second attempt was made, and again we were defeated. Each time the party which had led in all war legislation was to be ignored. Having failed to do the thing that the executive department of the Government ought to have welcomed in the interest of effective administration and economic management of the war, what else could we do? Upon every hand a wild orgy of waste was observed. Every protest met the same answer, it was not our concern. We started the investigation of these expenditures soon after the Republican Congress met. This was done in answer to a general demand from the people. Why? First, the people have a right to know how the money that they are paying in the form of taxation was and is being expended. No amount of boasting by Democratic politicians of what was done will answer that demand. Secondly, there is an inherent right in this Government to find the culpable party who takes advantage of his Government in time of war. If there has been anyone guilty of moral turpitude, taking advantage of the war to profiteer at the expense of this Government, then we have a right not only to point it out, but we must prosecute the men who have done it. [Applause on the Republican side.] People from every section of this country are demanding prosecution. Congress can not do that. That is the work of the Justice Department. Congress can uncover the facts. It is so doing. The Justice Department must prosecute.

It is generally believed that there will be no prosecutions, that an administration will not find itself guilty. There is a basis for this statement.

In the investigations thus far there was a report from the special commission upon aircraft, appointed by the President in response to the general outcry of the Nation for the actual situation. That report was made by Justice Hughes, whose commission was confined to finding facts. It made recommendations which were indorsed by the Attorney General of the present administration. The report was sent to the Secretary of War with the recommendation that certain specific men therein named be court-martialed, which recommendation was based on the facts submitted. In spite of the facts and recommendation, the Secretary of War decided that it was not a sufficient case to submit for court-martial proceedings. Although we had spent $1,055,000,000 for aircraft and had not a single American-built battleplane at the front and only 196 other American-built planes, yet we were told that there was no ground for court-martial procedure. This action of the War Department indicates what is to be expected from the administration in the prosecution of such cases. Congress can not go further than make the investigation. The Department of Justice, which in the aircraft case indorsed the Hughes recommendation, must necessarily make the prosecution when brought under the civil authority. The indictments secured by the Shipping Board investigations show what can be done. Another reason why we must uncover these irresponsible expenditures is to compel a repayment wherever it can be shown that funds have been collected under false contracts or where advantage has been taken of the Government. There are numerous cases of this sort already promised.

Still another reason why we must continue to make the investigation is to lay the foundation to cut off the unnecessary and continuing war agencies that still persist. We are bitterly assailed by the country because we have not been able to separate all the thousands of war workers who are still on the pay roll and who are employing every influence to continue on it. If you do not lay this foundation, we will not succeed in our efforts to get back to normal, and we are subject in Congress to the criticism that we are maintaining these war agencies. [Applause on the Republican side.] Our business here is not in any way to discredit men nor an administration because they do not happen to be on our side politically, but our business is to know how the money was spent, to let the public know it, to prosecute where there is guilt, to recover where there is fraud, and to lay the foundation to cure the disease that the whole Nation to-day is still suffering from. What has already been accomplished justifies us in an expectation that more will still be done. That is why I will vote for the rule. Our duty as Congressmen is to get at the facts. It is then up to the Department of Justice to prosecute the guilty parties. Indictments have already been secured in some cases and trials are awaited. If, as in the aircraft cases, the findings of a presidential commission are ignored, the only recourse left us is an appeal to the people, which will not be long deferred. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is considered as ordered, and the question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. POU. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 154, nays 113, answered "present" 2, not voting 159, as follows:

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House resolution 515 and House Report No. 816 under the rule.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House resolution 515, with Mr. WOOD of Indiana in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 515.

Whereas the hearings before the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department on the construction of camps and cantonments contain testimony tending to show that there was criminal conduct in connection with emergency construction work; and

Whereas said hearing disclose cases where it is alleged Government funds were fraudulently and illegally paid to contractors and others in connection with emergency construction work: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to refer to the Attorney General of the United States the testimony taken before the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department on the subject of camps and cantonments, together with the report of said committee and the minority views on that subject, with the request that the Attorney General institute investigations before grand juries for the purpose of indicting and prosecuting such persons as are guilty of criminal conduct, and to institute civil suits for the recovery of any Government funds which have been fraudulently or illegally paid on account of such emergency construction work.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, before we begin I would like to arrive at some understanding with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS]. As I understand it, there will be but two speeches on this side, one by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH] and the other by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], one to open and one to close. Will it be entirely satisfactory to the gentleman to use all of his time after the first speech on this side?

Mr. DOREMUS. And then let Mr. MCKENZIE close?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. Oh, certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, with that understanding, I yield one hour and a half to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH].

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, subcommittee No. 2 of the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department was directed and charged with the responsibility of investigating expenditures in connection with the construction and maintenance of camps and cantonments. The report, which is now before the House, covers 105 pages, and is a complete and exhaustive review of the testimony taken by the committee, with its conclusions, findings, and recommendations.

I have been asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], the chairman of the committee, to present to the House a brief analysis of the testimony and findings of the committee. In the time allotted to me I can only deal with the subject in the most general way. Our committee has endeavored to pursue its work systematically, and with but one thought in mind—to get the facts and disclose the truth.

Congress declared war; it raised the money necessary to carry on the war from the people by taxation, the authorization of bond issues, and otherwise; and by appropriations Congress allotted that money among the various executive branches of the Government to be expended for the prosecution of the war. Congress and the people are entitled to know how that trust was executed. If there was graft and criminality, those who are guilty should be punished; if there was undue extravagance and waste due to negligence or ulterior motives, those responsible should be condemned; if, on the other hand, the funds were properly expended, those who did their duty should receive the highest commendation. For the benefit of future generations, and that there may never be a repetition of any errors and mistakes that were made, an investigation of the kind pursued by our committee, we feel, can not but be of benefit to the public generally and the country.

"We won the war" has been made to cover a multitude of sins, and during the taking of testimony I have been impressed with the audacity of the claims of the profiteers. To hear them talk you would think that the fighting was done in the swivel chairs and over the roll-top desks, instead of on the battle fields. They pin upon themselves the golden badge marked "patriot" and sing from morning until night their own praises. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is not within the province or jurisdiction of this committee to prosecute crime or indict criminals. That is an executive and judicial duty, and while the testimony disclosed many cases of theft, of fraud, and of individual guilt, which should receive the attention of the Department of Justice, yet some of the greatest crimes that were committed against the public and the Government were probably technically "within the law." They were acts committed under a cloak of patriotism.

Much has been said about the Council of National Defense. I will refer to it only as its operations have a bearing on emergency construction. I have no criticism to make of the underlying purpose that actuated Congress to authorize the creation of the Council of National Defense. The idea of correlating and bringing into active operation, in order to successfully meet the emergency, the industrial, commercial, and manufacturing forces of the country, so that all elements would be working together with but a single purpose and to one end, was not only laudable, but, in my judgment, practical; and if the activities of the Council of National Defense had been confined to surveying, advising, recommending, and assisting the regularly constituted agencies of the Government, as the act creating it specifically provided, there perhaps could have been no criticism offered in regard to the Council of National Defense, its creation, or its operations. But instead of the committees of the Council of National Defense confining themselves to recommending and advising the regularly constituted agencies of the Government in the conduct of the war, they exceeded their powers, superseded the regularly constituted agencies, and assumed control.

The Council of National Defense was a holy thing put to an unholy use. It furnished the opportunity for interested parties to get control of the governmental distributing agencies, and while that control was assumed and usurped, being unauthorized by law, yet the effect was the same, the result being that the regularly constituted agencies, officered by men paid by the Government, and under oath to do their duty, agencies created to safeguard the Government and protect it, were in effect supplanted by the agents and friends of such interested parties operating through the committees of the Council of National Defense. The interested parties moved in and took possession, became both purchasers and sellers, and represented both the Government and themselves, because, acting for the Government, they purchased from themselves, their employers, affiliated concerns, or past and future clients. They not only assumed full control and became the purchasing agents for the Government, superseding the regularly constituted agencies, but they fixed the prices of the products that were to be sold to the Government, and acting in the dual capacity, in fact, if not in name, often of both purchasers and sellers, eliminated those whose duty it was to look after the interests of the Government. This was true in almost all lines, according to the testimony taken before our general committee, but it was glaringly so in connection with emergency construction.

When war was declared it was decided that 16 National Army cantonments should be constructed and 16 National Guard camps. These were to be distributed in zones throughout the country with a view to facilitating mobilization and training of troops.

The construction of these camps and cantonments and construction generally by the Construction Division involved the expenditure of approximately $1,200,000,000. The structures to be built were of the simplest character, being mere shelters. The first consideration was speed in construction, for our soldiers had to be encamped and trained with all possible dispatch. The second consideration was to get the best construction at a reasonable price.

The War Department was the regularly constituted agency charged under the law with the duty of providing shelter for our troops. Newton D. Baker was the Secretary of War, so that the responsibility for what was done and for what happened is directly chargeable to the War Department and to the Secretary of War. Instead of the War Department functioning and this work being carried on by the regularly constituted agency of the Government, receiving advice, recommendations, and assistance from outside sources or committees, and following such advice and recommendations to the extent that it was deemed wise to do so, a subcommittee of the Council of National Defense, called the emergency construction committee, came forward, kicked the War Department out bag and baggage, and assumed absolute control. This was done with the approval of the Secretary of War, and the effect of it was that men who owed only a moral and not a legal duty to the Government transacted the business that should have been carried on by men who were under oath to protect the Government in a legal as well as a moral way. The system was by written record attempted to be justified upon the theoretical ground that patriotism would temper the average greed and avarice of human nature; that all men in this emergency were patriots willing to subordinate their own personal interests to those of the Government, which can only be described as a beautiful theory advanced by impractical men in charge of very practical affairs. If the Secretary of War, instead of being a theorist, had been a practical business man, he never would have permitted the ordinary rules of business conduct to have been abrogated on a theoretical idea that all men would subordinate their own avarice for patriotic purposes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

ISSUE JOINED ON COST-PLUS SYSTEM.

It is clear, after months of investigation and the taking of volumes of testimony by our committee, that an issue is squarely joined between the majority members of the committee and the minority, and that issue is, whether or not the cost-plus system, which was adopted and followed with the approval of the Secretary of War, was a proper system to have been put into operation under the circumstances attending the emergency.

The majority members of the committee assert that the cost-plus system was not a proper system to have followed; that it was a reprehensible system; that it resulted in delays, fraud, waste, and extravagance, the far-reaching effects of which will be felt for years and years to come by the people of the United States.

The minority justifies the cost-plus system, contending that it was necessary, due to the circumstances surrounding the emergency. The issue, therefore, is clearly joined and made.

There can be no doubt about who was finally responsible for the system adopted, as the Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, in testifying before our committee assumes full responsibility for the adoption of the cost-plus system, stating to the committee that it had his approval.

In view of the fact that the Secretary of War admits responsibility for the cost-plus system, it is not at all strange that the minority should attempt a justification of the system, because, if the contention of the majority is justified by the facts, the executive branch of the Government is responsible for a system that has and had more far-reaching detrimental effects upon the American people than any one act of omission or commission in connection with this emergency. It is the contention of the majority that the cost-plus system invited waste and extravagance to such an extent that the results are revolting to contemplate; that while speed was all important, and is advanced by the minority as the reason for its adoption, the facts are the cost-plus system caused delay.

The majority contends that whether or not the adoption of the cost-plus system is traceable to a willful and successful attempt to open the door for the profiteer, or merely an error in judgment on the part of the executive officers of the Government in adopting the wrong system, the adoption of that system did result in giving interested parties and those who were seeking to profit by the emergency and its necessities every opportunity to do so, and words are not strong enough to express the bitter condemnation that should fall upon the executive branch of the Government for the adoption of this reprehensible system.

EMERGENCY CONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

The cost-plus system, which was approved by the Secretary of War, was decided upon by what is known as the emergency construction committee, a subcommittee of the general munitions board of the Council of National Defense. This committee decided upon the policy, prepared the form of contract and the various provisions of the contract, such as the fees to be paid contractors, etc. This committee selected the contractors who were to do the work, exercising absolute and autocratic control over the whole situation.

Who made up the personnel of this emergency construction committee, which was permitted to assume such far-reaching powers, involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars, under a contract that gave the contractor almost unlimited authority in disbursing Government money? Who made up the personnel of this committee which was permitted by the Secretary of War to assume the prerogatives that belonged to the regularly constituted agencies of the Government?

At the time the emergency construction contract was formulated the emergency construction committee of the Council of National Defense was made up of the following members: W. A. Starrett, chairman, a member of the firm of Starrett & Van Vleck, architects, New York; C. W. Lundoff, of the firm of Crowell-Lundoff-Little, construction contractors, Cleveland; and M. C. Tuttle, general manager of the Aberthaw Construction Co., Boston.

W. A. Starrett, the chairman, had for the clients of his firm and did business with the large contractors of the country. He is now the vice president of the George A. Fuller Co., one of the largest firms of contractors in the country, which concern had many Government contracts during the war.

C. W. Lundoff, of the firm of Crowell-Lundoff-Little, construction contractors, Cleveland, later resigned from the emergency construction committee, and through the Cleveland Construction Co. he, acting as general manager, constructed Camp Perry, a $5,000,000 governmental project.

M. C. Tuttle, the other member of the committee, was the vice president of the Aberthaw Construction Co., Boston, which company received contracts during the war. How M. C. Tuttle came to be selected as a member of the emergency construction committee is shown by the testimony of Frank A. Scott, of the Council of National Defense, who told our committee that Mr. Tuttle had come to Washington looking for a job; that "He came to scoff and remained to pray." He evidently decided that it was his duty to remain here in Washington as a member of the emergency construction committee, distributing contracts, rather than to return to Boston with a contract. When Mr. Scott was asked what Mr. Tuttle's experience was that justified his appointment, he said, "I knew nothing of his experience except that he was vice president of the Aberthaw Construction Co., which is one of the great construction firms, which you probably know," and he added, "When a man gets excited and forgets he came here looking for a job, it would show responsibility." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Tuttle came representing a contractor, and he stayed at a dollar a year to represent the Government on a committee that distributed contracts involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars.

This emergency construction committee was permitted to assume the power, first, of deciding upon the form of contract and the policy to be followed in emergency construction; second, to select arbitrarily the contractors who were to be given contracts. This committee was permitted to supersede and supplant the regular agencies of the War Department, and they were allowed to override the views of Army officers, such as Gen. Littell, of the Quartermaster Corps, who was compelled to bow to the "superior judgment," as he puts it in his testimony, of the members of this committee, and accept their views as to the details of the form of the contract and the policy to be pursued.

In my opinion, this committee, with other committees of the Council of National Defense, were responsible for the representations that were made to the public that the emergency found this country absolutely without any preparation to meet it. It is true that our preparedness was not as great as it would have been had persons in executive authority counseled and recommended legislation looking toward preparedness at the beginning of the World War in Europe, but to attempt to make it appear that we had no plans and facilities for meeting the emergency, as had been contended by the committees of the Council of National Defense, is not only absurd but utterly and absolutely untrue. It has appeared time and again in the testimony of the swivel-chair patriots appearing before our committee that the Council of National Defense and its committees found the Government unprepared in every particular. To show the falsity of these statements I need but refer to one situation, which is typical.

In connection with emergency construction it was necessary to have a corps of engineers. In fact, it was contended by Gen. Goethals that the way to construct the cantonments and provide shelter for our troops was not to call in contractors, but to have the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, who were trained in construction, go upon the job, and in behalf of the Government and for the Government build the structures that were necessary to house our troops.

The committee on emergency construction either did not know that we had a trained Corps of Engineers available, or they refused to permit them to function, because they developed a corps of engineers for each cantonment from civilian life. Many excuses were given by those who testified before our committee as to why the trained Corps of Engineers of the Army had not been utilized, but not one of their excuses would carry conviction to the reasonable mind.

The truth is that West Point was established as an Engineers' school in the year 1802. Every year since that school was founded there has been selected for the Corps of Engineers the men who stood first in their classes at that school, with the result that we have in the Army Engineer Corps the greatest engineers in the world, and we had at the beginning of this emergency in the Corps of Engineers immediately available 165 officers. They also had within their organization on their reserve list the best engineering talent of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Corps of Engineers had been so divided in zones throughout the country that there was in every zone where a cantonment was to be constructed a district office of the Corps of Engineers, whose officers could have been gotten upon any job in not to exceed one week. For instance, at Wheeling, W. Va., within a hundred miles of Chillicothe, where Camp Sherman was built, there was a district office of the United States Army Corps of Engineers, which, according to the testimony of Col. Sherrill, could have been gotten onto the job and started construction in less than a week. To contend that this Corps of Engineers was not a competent adjunct of the American Army is ludicrous. They built the Panama Canal. They have built every great engineering project in connection with our waterways. They were the banner corps of the United States Army, and yet Mr. Starrett, the architect, Mr. Lundoff, the contractor, and Mr. Tuttle, the contractor, refused to utilize this Corps of Engineers, which was ready and waiting to meet this emergency, and they developed from contractors' organizations in civilian life the engineering force to carry on this work at a large expense to the Government.

Col. Sherrill, of the Corps of Engineers, a West Point man, who has been in the service for 22 years and who is recognized as one of its most efficient officers, appeared before our committee under subpœna and testified as to the personnel and the organization of the Corps of Engineers prior to the declaration of war and after the declaration of war; also as to the work they accomplished in France. Col. Sherrill stated to the committee that the Corps of Engineers had ready, available, and waiting an efficient force competent to have constructed the camps and cantonments; although the Army regulations provide "the duties of the Corps of Engineers comprise reconnoitering and surveying for military purposes, including the laying out of camps," and while the Corps of Engineers, through Gen. Sharpe, notified those in executive authority that they were ready and waiting to undertake this work, having in every zone where a camp was to be constructed an office of the Corps of Engineers with complete data as to labor conditions and all information necessary to enable them to enter upon the work promptly and without delay, yet they were not called upon; they were absolutely ignored, and the emergency construction committee took weeks to decide upon the form of a contract, took weeks to select the contractors, took a great deal of time developing the several engineer organizations necessary to carry on the work at the various camps, while an efficient organization of the Government remained idly by, waiting to be called to duty in the emergency.

The facts as disclosed by the testimony of Col. Sherrill, which is substantiated in every particular by the testimony of Gen. Black, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, furnish positive proof that the contentions we have made are justified, that the regularly constituted agencies of the Government were superseded by men from contracting firms, and that these men, with the approval of the Secretary of War, fixed things to suit themselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Col. Sherrill said:

The Engineer Department was and is organized so that, with no difficulty whatever, it could have so allocated construction work among the then existing construction districts as to have accomplished it in a very brief time economically and efficiently.

The Engineer Department has approximately 35 engineering districts located throughout the country for civil work and for the construction of military work. Some of these districts carry on both civil and military construction, as, for instance, the district at Norfolk carries on all fortifications work in that district, and carries on all work necessary for the development and upkeep of the river and harbor improvements. To any one of those districts there could have been assigned the construction of one, two, or three cantonments, and it could have been done without any interruption whatever. For instance, the officer who was in charge of the Wheeling district at the outbreak of the war told me this morning, in speaking of the matter, that he could have handled the two camps—the one at Chillicothe and the other one in that section—with his organization without the slightest difficulty whatever.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Was he called upon to do so?

Col. SHERRILL. He was not.

On the very important question of delay, Col. Sherrill testified:

Mr. MCCULLOCH. You say that these camps, these buildings and shelters, could have been built economically. What do you mean by that?

Col. SHERRILL. I mean that there would have been no waste of Government money, that every dollar the Government appropriated would have gone into useful construction at the lowest practical prices.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. You say that it could have been done promptly and without delay?

Col. SHERRILL. I do.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Will you elaborate on that? How would you have been able to have accomplished the work promptly and without delay?

Col. SHERRILL. One of the greatest causes for delay in undertaking a large piece of work is due to lack of organization with which to start the work and get it going; therefore, the Engineers were in a position to have eliminated that large element of delay, because the organization was ready-made to initiate this work without any delay, and they could have taken it up step by step as the plans allowed the work to be pushed, so I do not believe there would have been any unnecessary delay.

Col. Sherrill was asked the question:

Mr. MCCULLOCH. You were not called upon to do it?

Col. SHERRILL. No, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MCCULLOCH. And you did have the organization available during the emergency?

Col. SHERRILL. We were available, and it was our duty, and we were not called upon to do it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MCCULLOCH. You heard Gen. Black say that he had a conference with Gen. Sharpe on this proposition, did you not?

Col. SHERRILL. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MCCULLOCH. And that the information was conveyed to those in authority that you had the facilities to go ahead with this work.

Col. SHERRILL. That, I believe, was reported by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. And you were ready to do it?

Col. SHERRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. But, in fact, you were not called upon to do it?

Col. SHERRILL. No, sir.

With the greatest engineering organization in the world available, an organization the training of the officers of which has cost this Government millions of dollars, men trained for just such an emergency as confronted the country; men who built the Panama Canal; men who were waiting and ready to do their duty, to look after and safeguard the interests of the Government; men who had no obligations to outside interests; men who had no clients except their Government; men who could be relied upon to be influenced by no motives except those which would be for the welfare of their Government, having been educated and trained by the Government for this very purpose, this organization was thrown into the discard, ignored, and humiliated, and a committee composed of former architects and contractors were permitted to get control of this emergency construction work. The bulk of the emergency construction work in America had been practically completed by the first part of December, 1917, and the Corps of Engineers had not been utilized on this work, although comparatively few officers of the Corps of Engineers went to France until late in the spring of 1918. The Corps of Engineers executed all construction work of every description under the American Army in France. The efficiency of that great organization was demonstrated by the work of those officers at the battle front and in the Services of Supply at the rear, where they surmounted all difficulties and successfully, expeditiously, and economically carried on every engineering task, including the building of wharves, docks, dams, railroads, and bridges as well as shelters for the housing of American troops. But this great organization was ignored in America and contractors selected to do their work. [Applause on the Republican side.]

How any such procedure can be excused, much less justified, is beyond my comprehension, and I challenge the minority to show one syllable of testimony offered before our committee in justification of this procedure that would appeal to any reasonable mind.

The testimony of Col. Sherrill, which is supported by Gen. Black, and which is not refuted by a single witness that appeared before our committee, is to the effect that the Government of the United States was prepared to meet the emergency, so far as the construction of camps and cantonments was concerned; that the department would have functioned in such a manner as to eliminate any great amount of waste and extravagance; that they were in a position to supervise the work so as to get a day's work for a day's wage, and yet, in the face of those facts, they were absolutely disregarded and an outside agency brought in to do the work.

PLANS.

It has been contended by this emergency construction committee that there were no plans and specifications prepared and ready for this emergency construction. There again they either did not know or did not want to find out that for two years the Quartermaster Corps had been looking forward to an emergency and that the trained officers of the Army, which this American Government at large expense had educated for just such a situation, had prepared plans and detailed material lists for sheltering American troops, and the plans and material lists were so drawn that any sized camp for the purpose of housing any number of troops could be prepared in the course of a day, with the exception of plans for the utilities, which could have been prepared as the work progressed, it only being a question of the layout, and yet this emergency construction committee contended that in that regard we were absolutely and utterly unprepared, a statement that was as false as it was absurd.

Gen. Littell testified before our committee that he regarded the Army as prepared for the emergency, so far as plans for sheltering troops were concerned. He said:

Well, we considered that, as far as plans for buildings were concerned, we were pretty well prepared in every way to house troops.

Now, if the regularly constituted agency or corps existing in the War Department had been utilized, if the Secretary of War had followed the method suggested by Gen. Goethals, using Camp Sherman as a typical example of what could have been done, within a week after the site had been determined upon the Army Engineers could have been on the job laying out the camp, ordering the material, providing the labor necessary to carry on the work, for they had a survey of labor conditions in every zone, the plans and material lists were prepared in writing, and, according to the statement of Col. Sherrill, the work could have been under way in less than a week. What happened? It has been contended that speed was all-important. Why, it took the emergency construction committee six weeks to decide upon the form of contract they would use. It took them more than another month to make the selection of the favored contractors and get them on the job.

The final conclusion that is to be drawn from such a situation as this must be determined by the application of certain tests. Either the Secretary of War was incompetent to handle the emergency that confronted him and to utilize the agencies of the Government and the trained men who were in the service and available and permitted interested parties to get control, or he was so derelict in his duty, in his failure to properly supervise what was going on, that he allowed the situation to get away from him, either of which would bring down upon his head and the executive branch of this Government the severest condemnation if it turns out, as I shall endeavor to show before I have completed my statement, that the result of the operations of the emergency construction committee and the result of the superseding of regularly constituted agencies by outside agencies caused a loss to the Government of not only millions but hundreds of millions of dollars—undoubtedly caused the loss of the lives of American soldiers; caused a reduction of the morale of American business, which has gone all around the cycle to the detriment of every American citizen, and is responsible to a large degree, according to the testimony of responsible naval officers and other experts before our committee familiar with the operation of cost-plus contracts, for the high cost of living throughout this country to-day.

THE EMERGENCY CONSTRUCTION CONTRACT.

The first action taken by the emergency construction committee after it was permitted to assume full control was to decide upon the form of contract to be used and the policy that was to be followed in emergency construction. They decided to build these cantonments, as has been shown, under what was known as the cost-plus percentage contract. In deciding upon that method they rejected the bid system; also the system which was recommended by Gen. Goethals of building the cantonments under the direction of Army Engineers by directing competent men to go out on the job and build the camps for the Government, and they also rejected what is known as the unit bid system. According to the testimony of men of such wide experience as Gen. Goethals, Admiral Harris, Mr. Wetmore, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and many others, the cost-plus system is reprehensible at all times, because it opens the door for fraud and great extravagance, for the padding of pay rolls, reduces the morale of labor, eliminates the incentive for the contractor to speed up or economize, delays the work and increases the cost, and is a contract that was seldom, if ever, used before the war. Cost-plus contracts had been used by the Navy Department at certain times, and, according to the testimony, they were never used unless they contained what were called "essential safeguards," such as, first, a guaranty of maximum cost; second, a bonus for saving and forfeiture for excess cost; and, third, a bonus for completing in less than an estimated time and a forfeiture for delay beyond such time.

I can not take the time to elaborate upon the arguments that were made, as shown by the testimony, before this emergency construction committee in favor of safeguards, except to say that everybody except only the three members of the committee, so far as the record shows, urged that if the cost-plus contract were to be used safeguards should be put into it, but this emergency construction committee, constituted as I have indicated, ignored all arguments and disregarded all advice, and not only arbitrarily decided upon this reprehensible system but wiped out and away every safeguard, leaving the contractor free not only to spend all the money that he wanted to spend but to take all the time that he saw fit to take in constructing these camps. Not a single safeguard was placed in the contract that would either speed the work or cut the cost. The floodgates were thrown down that a golden stream might flow away. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It can not be contended for a moment that the emergency construction committee was not warned in regard to the effects of the working of the cost-plus system, but it absolutely overruled and paid no heed whatever to the admonitions, advice, and warnings of men of real experience, who advised against the adoption of the system, who pointed out its weaknesses and the effect that its adoption would probably have upon the country, and the Secretary of War stood with the emergency construction committee.

At one of the conferences, when the form of contract and the policy to be followed were under consideration, Gen. Goethals was present by invitation of Mr. Scott, chairman of the general munitions board of the Council of National Defense. It is not necessary for me to point out to this House the experience of Gen. Goethals. He is known as one of the foremost engineers in the world. [Applause.]

Gen. Goethals, testifying before the committee, condemned the cost-plus contract. He said:

Why, it is liable to lead to great extravagance. The contractor is not interested in what it is going to cost the Government. He is going to get his 10 per cent anyhow, and the fact of the matter is, his return being based upon a percentage of cost, the more he pays for labor and material the greater is his return. Therefore there is no incentive for him to economize. The Government takes all the risks and the contractor takes none.

The chairman asked Gen. Goethals this question:

From your experience during this war with these matters, do you believe now that it was necessary to adopt that system in order to get the supplies we really needed?

And Gen. Goethals answered:

I NEVER thought so.

I quote the following from Gen. Goethals's testimony:

Gen. GOETHALS. When the question of cantonments came up, they had quite a discussion, and Mr. Scott asked me if I would not attend the hearings that were to be held and the discussion of the subject. The whole uncertainty of the proposition was outlined there. They did not have the plans. It was necessary to begin work at once. These various sites throughout the country were to be cleared and prepared for cantonments. I attended the discussion and advocated at that time that there were plenty of construction engineers in the country who could be secured who would handle building propositions to a great extent, and if they would select competent men and draft them into the service, and send one man and put him actually in charge of the work there, it would not be necessary to wait for plans or anything. They could begin construction at once, and not employ contractors under any circumstances, in view of the situation as outlined there. And I still believe that was the method to have followed.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. You were overruled in that meeting?

Gen. GOETHALS. I was not a part of that meeting; I was just asked to sit in at the meeting, and I just made that suggestion.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. It was not adopted, however?

Gen. GOETHALS. No; it was not adopted.

Gen. Littell, who was chief of the cantonment division of the Quartermaster Department, appeared before our committee under subpœna, and testified that he sent a communication to Mr. Starrett, chairman of the emergency construction committee, dated May 5, 1917, protesting against the proposed contract for the construction of cantonments. In that letter he pointed out that, in his opinion, the contract as drawn was entirely in favor of the contractor. In that letter Gen. Littell said:

With reference to the proposed contract for the construction of cantonments, it is believed that the contract, as drawn, is entirely in favor of the contractor.

Gen. Littell finally in his testimony admitted that he was compelled to or did bow to the assumed "superior judgment" of the members of the emergency construction committee on all matters relating to the form of the contract and its provisions. In this connection, and as bearing upon the question of delay, I call attention to the fact that Gen. Littell, in a memorandum dated May 31, 1917, addressed to Mr. Scott of the Council of National Defense, urged that the form of contract should be determined upon so that the construction work could be proceeded with. This was nearly two months after war was declared. He said:

We have reached a point where it is very necessary that we have a form of contract upon which the construction of cantonments can be let. Three of the camp sites have been definitely fixed and others will soon be determined. We are most anxious to get the work started, but will not do so until we have the contract forms. * * * May I ask you to have your committee informed of my desire to get the contract form at the earliest possible date?

According to the testimony of Gen. Littell, it took the emergency construction committee from five to six weeks to complete the form of contract alone.

I quote the following in regard to the attitude of the experts of the Navy Department as to this contract, which shows clearly that, after listening to the deliberations of the emergency construction committee, the Navy Department refused to give its approval to their plans and to the contract. [Quoting from Mr. Starrett's report:]

It should be here recorded that when the deliberations were about finished and the contract was near its final draft, the emergency construction committee was surprised to receive word from the Navy Department that it did not acquiesce in the recommendations about to be made. Admiral Harris, then in charge of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, sent a note to Mr. Scott, stating that he regarded the proposed contract as inadequate, but since his representatives had contributed much to the deliberations, and, further, since he had made no suggestion as to where the loopholes occurred, his comment could not be regarded as constructive criticism.

How it could be possible that architects and contractors, such as those who made up the emergency construction committee, could have been permitted to put over on this American Government, against the advice of such men as Gen. Goethals and Gen. Littell and the Navy Department experts, this reprehensible system is more than I can conceive. How the Secretary of War, as the executive head of the War Department, responsible for the acts of that department—a department that the Congress of the United States had intrusted with the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars of the people's money—can justify the putting over of this kind of a scheme is beyond my comprehension. If there had been no bad results flow from it, we might forget it and content ourselves with a criticism of a scheme that permitted the regularly constituted agencies of the Government to be subordinated to a civilian committee, composed of architects and contractors; but the system did result in the most serious consequences. The testimony was to the effect that the emergency construction committee passed the contracts around to their particular friends.

The contractors went on the job entitled to a fee which ranged on a sliding scale from 10 to 6 per cent, and the contract was so drawn that the contractor in fact was required to give only his personal services for the fees he received. It was so drawn that as many subcontractors as were desired could be put upon the job, and the result was that a contractor, without assuming any financial responsibility whatever, was in a position to make a maximum fee of $250,000, covering a period of a very few months for mere supervision and the furnishing of what they called an organization, which the Government paid for. This system permitted contractors and subcontractors to receive salaries for personal services that amounted, in many instances, to as much as $250,000 for five months' work, or $50,000 per month. And they said that was necessary because the Government did not have the facilities to do this work, when, according to the testimony, they allowed the greatest engineers in the world, who had been working for the Government all their lives at mediocre salaries, to sit here in Washington waiting for something to do.

Will anybody say that a man of Gen. Goethals's ability would not have been able to go on the job at Camp Sherman, with the information that was available and the surveys that had been made in that zone by the Corps of Engineers, with all the power of the United States Government back of him, the price of material having been fixed by the Government, and develop an organization to do that work as quickly as some unknown quantity would have been able to do it? And yet, when they had available these men of ability and training, who were willing to go on the job as the servants of the Government at a minimum salary and look after the Government's interests, they employed some firm at Toledo and gave them $250,000 for a few months' work.

The emergency construction committee says that the Government was not in a position to undertake the work. Gen. Goethals says the Government was in a position to undertake the work in the most effective way possible. Gen. Black and Col. Sherrill, of the Corps of Engineers, say that the Government was ready and able to undertake the work, and had every facility for carrying it on in the most economical and expeditious way.

Testimony before our committee is to the effect that contractors were available, ready, and waiting to bid upon emergency construction work, and that if the bid system had been followed a saving of millions of dollars would have been the result, but the Secretary of War permitted interested parties to get control, and while our soldiers were fighting in France, offering their lives for the cause at $30 a month, the Government was paying contractors $50,000 a month for mere personal supervision, which consisted, in many instances, of riding around over the camp grounds in an automobile for perhaps 30 minutes a day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Thus far I have dealt entirely with operations in Washington. The emergency construction committee, having fixed up the contract in the most advantageous way possible for the contractors and the favored contractors having been selected, let us look to the testimony as to how the contract worked out. Our committee has made an extensive investigation of two camps. We sent investigators upon the ground, who interviewed men who worked upon the jobs, endeavoring to secure first-hand information as to just what occurred. Our committee then held hearings at two of the camps—Camp Sherman and Camp Grant. It was not our purpose to prosecute or persecute anybody. In seeking after the truth as to what actually happened on the ground we called foremen and workmen of various classes, carpenters, bricklayers, plasterers, roofers, plumbers, steam fitters, common laborers, water boys, and so forth. The witnesses were all sworn, and they were questioned by members of the committee, not formally, as would be done in a lawsuit, but more or less informally.

I can not take the time to read to the House any of the testimony that was taken before our committee on the question of waste and extravagance, for the reason that it is so voluminous that even a general review of it would be out of the question in the time allotted to me. Therefore I must content myself by giving the House a general statement of the conclusions drawn by the committee from the testimony, and if Members desire to pursue the matter in detail, they will find in the report a brief, reviewing the evidence showing waste and extravagance, and in the hearings will be found volumes of testimony upon that subject. The committee has caused an abstract of the testimony to be prepared and printed for the convenience of the Members of the House, which is submitted in connection with the report.

The committee found that waste and extravagance began at the very inception of the work. More materials were ordered than were needed. There seemed to be absolutely no check system nor method followed in the ordering of materials. Carload after carload of lumber, of hardware, of cement, and building materials generally were dumped indiscriminately on the ground where the camps were to be constructed. While a feeble attempt was made to check the material as it came in, yet the evidence was positive and conclusive upon the point that there was no adequate check and that the Government was forced to accept the invoices of material men without a proper check having been made of the invoices with the material received. After the materials were on the ground the methods followed in handling them resulted in waste of a kind and nature that is appalling. There seemed to be an effort made on the part of nearly everybody to destroy and waste as much material as possible. As an instance, loads of finishing lumber were dumped into mudholes for the purpose of repairing roads. It was a common thing to have trucks run over piles of lumber and destroy it.

Hundreds of kegs of nails were left out in the open and in the rain to rust and ruin. Carloads of cement were left out in the open to be destroyed by the elements. Little effort seemed to be made to protect the materials in any way. During the process of construction it was a common thing to saw a foot or two off of a board and throw the balance into the scrap heap. After a building was completed all of the materials that remained in the building, often including bundles of flooring unopened, building paper, kegs of nails, and everything that was in the building were thrown into a scrap pile and hauled to a dump heap where they were afterwards burned, without any systematic effort made to salvage or save. The workmen were encouraged to destroy good material, and the idea seemed to permeate their minds that the greater the waste the better the contractor would be pleased, for the more money he would get out of the job by way of percentage. It has been estimated by dozens of witnesses, and not controverted to my knowledge by a single witness, that the waste in materials was from one-fourth to one-third, and in some cases as much as one-half of the entire amount used in the construction.

I believe that a careful analysis of the testimony by anyone who is unbiased and conservative will disclose that from the beginning to the end—that is, from the ordering of the material to the final completion of the work, taking into consideration the lack of system in ordering and the methods that were followed throughout the construction—there was a loss in materials of at least 25 to 50 per cent. It was a riot of waste at all camps that has cost the people of this country millions upon millions of dollars, and which is directly traceable and results from the cost-plus system which was put into operation with the approval of the Secretary of War.

LUMBER.

At Camp Sherman lumber was burned in such quantities that the men who burned it were compelled to lay off frequently for the reason that the fires got so hot they were afraid of burning down the cantonment. On an estimate made of 50,000,000 feet of lumber used at Camp Sherman, testimony was to the effect that at least 12,500,000 feet were wasted. Finishing lumber and flooring in bundles that were never untied were, according to the testimony, hauled away and burned. At Camp Meade Col. Oury testified that he employed his entire regiment of 3,000 men a week in carrying the waste lumber off the drill ground. Witnesses testified that there was enough lumber wasted at Camp Sherman to build another cantonment.

ROOFING.

Roofing material was piled like cordwood out in the sun and two-thirds became absolutely useless, for the reason that it could not be unrolled. Unbroken rolls of roofing material were hauled away and burned.

NAILS.

Tons of nails were hauled to the river and canal and thrown away. No workman took the trouble to go to the nail keg to empty his apron, but just dumped the nails where he stood. One witness testified that he went to the scrap pile and secured a truckload of nails and supplied himself and his entire neighborhood.

TRANSPORTATION.

Automobiles were hired by the day, invoiced at less than $400, for which the Government paid more than $800 each as rental. One and one-half ton trucks were rated as 3 tons and 5-ton trucks were rated as 7 tons, this fraud costing the Government an additional amount of a dollar per hour per truck. The testimony showed that they had 70 trucks and 450 teams on the pay roll at Camp Sherman, and that they had no use at all for 250 of the teams. These teams were kept on the pay roll, but were hidden away in the gravel pit, or ordered to drive around the camp to make it appear that they were being used.

IDLENESS.

The methods followed in the handling of workmen from the time of their employment and during the entire construction of the camps was such as to bring about a condition which has become notorious throughout the country, namely, that there was idleness and a willful waste of time which resulted in delaying the construction of the camps, and caused loss to the Government of millions of dollars in wages.

When work started upon these camps there was an effort made to get just as many people upon the pay rolls as possible. Wages were fixed without regard to the workmen's experience or ability. It soon became apparent that efficiency was not expected nor desired. Boys were employed as journeymen carpenters and paid journeymen's wages who had never worked at the carpenter trade an hour. It was testified that out of gangs of 25 to 30 men drawing wages as journeymen carpenters there would not be to exceed three or four who had ever worked at the carpenter trade. Everybody seemed to be employed as carpenters except carpenters, and the same was true in all trades, and very soon all the workmen on these jobs became permeated with the idea that the Government was an easy mark, and all they needed to do was to get on the pay roll and then loaf their time away. In fact, it was proven by dozens of witnesses, and not successfully controverted, that it was a common thing for gangs of men to be ordered to "get into the clear," to hide in the cornfields, or behind the hills, or in empty buildings, or any convenient place, just so they could keep on the pay roll. Everywhere the idea prevailed that the longer it took to complete the job and the more idleness that prevailed the more the contractor would get out of the job under the cost-plus system.

The record shows clearly that from 30 to 50 per cent of the labor was wasted; that hundreds of men were engaged in gambling in the wheat fields, the cornfields, and in nearly every building on the grounds; that the idlers on every job were so many that they were in the way of those supposed to be working; that there were so many men on the roofing job that at least one building actually collapsed by their weight. Witnesses testified that a continuous crap game was going on in one barrack building. The following statement taken from the record of the testimony of Ben J. Clark, timekeeper at Camp Sherman, gives a clear idea of what the testimony of many witnesses showed and the effect on speed of the cost-plus system. Mr. Clark testified:

You could go over that camp any time and see crowds of men collected here and there; any place where you knew they should not be. * * * You could go out in the wheat fields any time and see a poker game and a crap game. I don't mean one, but several of them. * * * It was not any trouble to go out in the cornfields and see the same thing. After the camp was in construction and the buildings went up, why, any time you wanted a poker game or crap game, all you had to do was just to look in three or four rooms and you would find one in one of the three or four anyway, and during my work at the base hospital group certain wards there seemed to be used for no other purpose than for shooting craps. * * * Every day, more or less, the same thing from the time they got there in the morning until the time they quit. They would not even stop to eat dinner; didn't have time; the game was too big. * * * I have seen a ring that would go clear the whole width of the room, maybe 30 or 40 men. I have seen two games in one ward; workmen supposed to be plumbers, supposed to be carpenters; others were cooks and fellows from the base hospital, both white and black—their color didn't make any difference—shooting craps on Government time.

One other of the many witnesses that verified Mr. Clark's statement as above detailed was Mr. Gunther, who had been a carpenter contractor for about 20 years, a very high-class man. He said:

I can't blame the carpenters much. The plumbers just loafed on the job. If the carpenters had used the same methods as the plumbers, the camp would not have been built to-day. The fault is in the management. Those responsible must be the contractors. There was not a man on the ground, visitor or employee, but what knew the conditions. * * * I would have regarded myself as derelict in my duty and perpetrating a fraud on the Government if I had permitted it and received a profit for it. As an instance, here in this room were 40 or 50 plumbers, and over here [indicating] 40 or 50 carpenters, and these plumbers were shooting "craps" or playing poker, and "getting by easy." "Why can't we?" The result is, the carpenters were using practically the same methods. Somebody was permitting it, and they were continuing to do it.

So many men were on all jobs that they were in one another's way. One witness testified:

I have seen three men have hold of an ordinary 2 foot 8 inch door to put it on the hinges.

A witness testified:

I have seen plumbers spend half a day building a sunshade under which to fix a joint that it would have taken two of them half an hour to put in.

While our soldiers lay sick and dying in unfinished, cold, damp hospital buildings, those charged with their construction and equipment were running a Monte Carlo.

It was necessary to dig temporary wells all over the camp for use before the water system was installed, and dirt that came out of the wells was piled alongside of the wells. After the water system had been installed, instead of using the dirt alongside the wells, an order was issued to haul dirt from the gravel pit, 3 miles away in some instances, and fill up the wells, and haul the dirt that came out of the wells originally back to the gravel pit.

I make the statement to the House, without fear of successful contradiction by anybody, that a careful analysis of the testimony before our committee will disclose that the work in all branches could have been done in just one-half the time that it was done had the Government secured a day's work for a day's wage, and had the workmen on the job been classified and paid according to their efficiency and their ability to do the work to which they were assigned. It was a common thing, according to the testimony, for men to check in in the morning and leave a job, come back to the camp and check out at night, receiving a full day's wage and pay. Foremen were ordered not to discharge anybody.

It would take me days to bring to the attention of the House all of the instances that were developed in the testimony of a similar character to those I have detailed. The criminal waste and idleness and the shame of it all is beyond comprehension.

EFFECT OF SYSTEM ON TIME.

The main contention of the emergency construction committee has been that the cost-plus system was necessary in order to get the shelters for our troops constructed in the shortest possible space of time. The majority members of the committee are ready to meet that issue with the facts, and we assert that the testimony shows that the cost-plus system meant a delay of at least 50 per cent in the time of construction.

A graphic chart has been prepared showing the time, according to the testimony, which it would have taken the regularly constituted agencies of the Government to have done the work if the plan suggested by Gen. Goethals had been followed and the time it actually took the emergency construction committee to do the work under the cost-plus system. If the Goethals plan had been followed, according to the chart, the cantonments would have been completed by about August 10, 1917, ready to receive 654,000 men, and there would have been released at that time over 100,000 workmen, who could have at once entered upon other essential war work. Under the cost-plus system it took them until December 1, 1917, to complete the 16 cantonments to a point where 654,000 men could be housed. In other words, if the Goethals plan had been followed, by August 10, 1917, as much work would have been done and accomplished on emergency construction as was accomplished under the cost-plus system by December 1, 1917.

In the reports that have been issued by the War Department praising the work of the emergency construction committee it is pointed out that on September 4, 1917, the camps were completed, when in truth and in fact they were not half completed at that time. My distinguished colleague, the minority member of subcommittee No. 2, has, in questioning the witnesses time and again, referred to these reports in which the claim is made that the camps were completed by September 4, 1917, when the facts are they were not completed so as to each house a division until the first part of December, 1917.

If the Goethals plan had been followed, with the thoroughly trained organization already in existence on April 7, 1917, the Chief of Engineers would have been ready to start active operations by calling upon his district engineer officers, located all over the country, to furnish data as to the supply of building materials in their localities and to make recommendations as to the sites. Surveys of labor conditions had already been made and a great trained force was ready for immediate operations. According to the testimony of Col. Sherrill, the Engineers would have been on the job and the construction under way by April 15, 1917, or one week after the order was issued. Under the cost-plus system, as shown by the chart, almost a month's time was lost after the declaration of war before the emergency construction committee was organized. Almost a month and a half was spent in determining upon the policy and drawing up a form of contract, selecting favored contractors, and so forth, so that under the cost-plus system it took them from April 7 until June 22 to get their construction work started, and it took them from June 22, as an average date when construction work started, until the first part of December to complete the camps. The facts are, and they stand out not to be refuted, that the Goethals plan would have completed the work by August 10 and the cost-plus system did not complete the work until the first part of December; that the Goethals plan would have saved 50 per cent in time and 50 per cent in cost.

EFFECT OF SYSTEM ON COST.

An effort has been made in the light of the testimony before the committee to give to the House some idea by way of comparative figures of the loss in the opinion of the majority members of the committee resulting to the Government because of the adoption of the cost-plus system. That such a comparison is hard to make with any degree of accuracy is admitted by the majority in the report. However, a fairly accurate conclusion, we believe, has been reached by the following comparisons:

A reliable contractor of wide experience and financial responsibility was asked by the committee to make a survey and an estimate of the cost of Camp Grant, located at Rockford, Ill., a typical camp. He was directed to make his estimate as nearly as possible upon conditions as they existed at the time the cantonment was built. A comparison of his estimate was made with the cost of the cantonment as nearly as could be determined from War Department records. The committee, from the figures submitted by the contractor referred to and the War Department records, arrived at the conclusion that Camp Grant could have been built for $9,119,544 if the bid system had been followed, when, according to the records in the War Department, it actually cost about $14,689,620. On that camp the committee estimates that the cost-plus system cost the Government a loss of $5,570,076. Following the same basis of figuring on the 16 National Army cantonments, the majority estimates that these 16 cantonments should have cost the Government, under the bid system, not to exceed $128,101,399. The records of the War Department show that these camps did cost not less than $206,632,920. On the basis of figuring detailed our committee estimates that the cost-plus system on the 16 National Army cantonments totaled a loss to the Government of approximately $78,531,521. I have included and shall have printed in connection with my remarks the table prepared by the committee showing the estimated figures of the cost of each of the 16 cantonments and the estimated loss to the Government under the cost-plus system, which table is as follows:

Name of camp.	Cost determined by committee from War Department records.	Proper cost.	Loss to taxpayers of United States.
Camp Lee	$19,060,920	$11,817,771	$7,243,149
Camp Meade	18,614,020	11,540,693	7,073,327

SUPERVISION.

Much has been said by those who seek to defend the cost-plus system about the Government's supervision of construction work through the Quartermaster General's Department and the fact that a constructing quartermaster representing the Government was assigned to each camp to supervise the work on behalf of the Government. At first I thought that perhaps that plan might, at least to some degree, protect the Government against some of the evil effects of the cost-plus system, but the interested parties had not overlooked a single situation. The Corps of Engineers were not only kicked out, but it is apparent from the testimony that the interested parties controlled at least in some instances the assignment of constructing quartermasters.

I need but call attention to one case to condemn the whole system of supervision and show its utter absurdity as a safeguard or protection to the Government. The facts in this one case should strike a deathblow at the contention of those who would make it appear that this supervision was anything more than another arm reaching into the Public Treasury. The testimony before our committee proves that the whole system of supervision was a farce and a joke at all camps, but the Camp Gordon case is the most glaring and open piece of conniving that has come to my notice. A man by the name of James Norman Pease had been employed as an engineer for more than three years prior to the war by an engineering concern doing business under the name of Lockwood, Greene & Co. The contract for building Camp Gordon near Atlanta, Ga., was given by the emergency construction committee to a contractor by the name of Arthur Tufts, who associated with himself several contracting firms of Atlanta and vicinity to assist in completing the work. Lockwood, Greene & Co. were given the contract for all engineering work in connection with the construction of Camp Gordon, but a few days before the contract was let to Lockwood, Greene & Co., the company's district manager, a Mr. Barnwell, recommended their own engineer, Mr. Pease, for a commission as constructing quartermaster, and he was afterwards assigned to supervise the construction of Camp Gordon. Pease remained as the representative of the Government, acting as constructing quartermaster supervising the work of his former employers until the camp was completed. After he was discharged from the Army, he returned to the employ of Lockwood, Greene & Co.

Men with business experience know that supervision of construction work on the part of the owner is ordinarily absolutely necessary to protect the owner against the violation of specifications both as to material and construction. The objection that would be urged to a former employee of the engineering or contracting concern supervising the work of the contractor would be that the supervision might be so lax as to permit the contractor to make money by violating the specifications.

What chance the peopie had under such a system I leave it to the Members of this House and the country to judge.

SOLDIERS SUFFERING.

I made the statement a little while ago that the cost-plus system and its operation caused intense suffering among American soldiers, and I desire briefly to call to the attention of the House the testimony upon which that statement was based. The winter of 1917, which began earlier than usual, was one of the most severe in recent years. Hundreds of thousands of American boys were being drafted into the Army and encamped at the various cantonments throughout the country. One of the great contentions of those who would justify the cost-plus system has been that speed was all-important in order that our soldiers might be properly housed. With that contention we agree, but we assert as a fact that the operation of the cost-plus system resulted in delay, which not only retarded the progress of our preparation for the emergency but caused great suffering among our soldiers. We make the charge that this suffering resulted directly from the cost-plus system, and, having so asserted, I offer the proof: At Chillicothe there was built an emergency hospital. The specifications provided that that hospital was to be heated with steam heat. Cold weather began early in the fall, and, according to the testimony before our committee, during the latter part of September, October, and November it was exceedingly cold. Witnesses testified that a gang of steam fitters was assigned to connect up the pipes in what was known as the base hospital at Camp Sherman; that it took from the middle of September until the first part of November to complete the steam lines; that during that time, while soldiers were in the hospital wards sick and without any heat, except such as was provided by oil stoves, the steam fitters, instead of doing their work connecting these pipes, that the sick soldiers might be kept warm and made comfortable, were engaged almost constantly in gambling, shooting craps, and idling their time away. The foreman in charge of the carpenter gang cutting the holes for the steam fitters reported, according to his sworn testimony, time and time again to the representatives of the contractors, that the steam fitters were gambling and idling their time away while our soldiers were suffering from the cold, and yet nothing was done to stop them.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Does the gentleman know when the plumbing was completed at Camp Sherman?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Not until about the 1st of December.

Mr. KEARNS. Does the gentleman know how many men died because of catching pneumonia on account of the cold?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I do not know.

Mr. KEARNS. It is up in the thousands.

Mr. DOREMUS. Oh, no.

Mr. McCULLOCH. There were many men who died, but whether it was because the steam was not on I do not know.

I quote the following from the testimony of Joseph E. Poole, Chillicothe, Ohio, which testimony is supported by a number of witnesses, and not a word of which testimony has ever been denied or any attempt made to controvert it:

Mr. McCULLOCH. You say to this committee that while those soldier boys were sick in those wards suffering from the cold——

Mr. POOLE. Actually pinched blue; their lips were blue; their finger nails blue.

Mr. McCULLOCH. That while they were in that condition, these steam fitters who were charged with the responsibility and the work of getting heat to those boys were shooting craps?

Mr. POOLE. Shooting crap.

Mr. McCULLOCH. And idling their time away?

Mr. POOLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCULLOCH. While those boys were suffering?

Mr. POOLE. That is the most harrowing feature of it. We could overlook the cost and the waste, or I could at least, if we could eliminate the suffering that those boys endured there. The nurses and the doctors did the best they could for them, under the circumstances. They distributed little oil stoves around, which in zero weather wasn't much.

Mr. McCULLOCH. How were the doctors going; how were they clad?

Mr. POOLE. They had on sheepskin-lined coats and the nurses had furs all muffled up.

Mr. McCULLOCH. And yet those boys were in there without any heat?

Mr. POOLE. Without any heat.

Mr. McCULLOCH. In rooms where the nurses had to go with their furs on and the doctors with fur-lined overcoats?

Mr. POOLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCULLOCH. And during all this time, now, you say that these steam fitters were gambling and idling their time away?

Mr. POOLE. Yes; they were.

Capt. William J. Say, of the Medical Corps, who was assigned to duty at the base hospital, Camp Sherman, wrote a letter to the chairman of our committee from St. Louis on November 4, 1919, in which he said:

What Joseph Poole says about the nurses and physicians wearing overcoats in the wards is true.

The suffering and inconvenience of the officers in their quarters was worse than in the wards. New officers' quarters were erected in the early spring, and 10 steam fitters worked in the building from early morning until late in the evening from spring until the following winter killing time. They played cards and billiards occasionally, but generally when the medical officers were about they would be putting up or taking down the same pipe over and over again—one or two men doing the work and the others looking on. When winter came we had to use coal-oil stoves nearly up to Christmas.

Joseph Poole furnished the committee the following telegram from Christian R. Holmes, major, Medical Corps:

I am sick at the post-graduate hospital in New York, but can not refrain from congratulating you on revealing the truth before the congressional committee about the criminal conduct of the steam fitters and others at the base hospital.

The testimony before our committee shows that there was a great deal of suffering among the soldiers caused by the idleness, loafing, lack of system, and method that prevailed among the gangs putting up the furnaces in the barracks; that while the American soldiers were suffering from the cold workmen were idling their time away, working to no purpose, with the result that the furnaces would sometimes lie three or four days for the want of about 15 minutes' work in connecting a pipe, and that because of the lack of system and the methods that were followed workmen were either not permitted to connect the pipe or did not do so. So that not only was there waste and extravagance and loss of time as a result of the operation of the cost-plus system, but there was undoubtedly great suffering among the soldiers and because of the idleness, lack of system, and utter disregard of conditions due to the operation of this system.

Let those who would justify the cost-plus system account to the soldiers and the parents of the soldiers, who, according to the testimony of Foreman Poole, were "actually pinched blue; their lips were blue; their finger nails were blue" from the cold, and while this condition obtained the steam fitters, working under a contractor who had a cost-plus percentage contract, were shooting craps and gambling; and, according to the testimony of Foreman Poole, this condition obtained for a period of five weeks, and Foreman Poole swears that the representatives of the contractor knew about it, that they were warned and told about it time and time again, and that they paid no attention to it.

RECOVERIES.

The majority report contains a brief on the law, and if the conclusions in the brief are correct the Department of Justice, on the facts set out in the testimony taken before our committee, should proceed at once to recover by civil action from contractors and others money illegally paid.

It is the opinion of the majority members of the committee, in the light of the decisions set out in the brief on the law and the facts developed by the testimony, that the color of fraud has arisen in many transactions to such an extent as to taint such entire transactions with fraud, and that the Government can recover amounts conservatively estimated at upward of $6,000,000 on some of the cantonments. If the conclusions of the majority members of the committee are correct, the Department of Justice should be able to recover by civil suits in excess of $50,000,000 on the 16 National Army cantonments. The committee has set out in detail in the report specific instances and cases where it recommends that the Department of Justice institute proceedings for the recovery of money illegally paid. The committee has developed facts that not only justify the Department of Justice proceeding with investigations at the various camps for the purpose of instituting civil suits for recovery of money illegally expended, but the committee believes that the facts contained in the record of the testimony are such as to make it the clear duty of the Attorney General of the United States to institute such suits at once. [Applause on the Republican side.]

PROSECUTIONS.

In the beginning of my statement I pointed out that it is not within the province nor the duty of this committee to prosecute crime or indict criminals. That is an executive and judicial function.

The report of the majority contains facts and evidence, and the record of the testimony taken in connection with the construction of Camp Sherman at Chillicothe, Ohio, and Camp Grant at Rockford, Ill., contains evidence on which the Department of Justice should immediately predicate grand jury investigations, with a view to indicting individuals guilty of criminal conduct in connection with the expenditure of public funds.

The majority members of the committee believe that the facts developed at these two camps were such as to justify and require investigations by the Department of Justice of criminal conduct at all camps.

Our committee has completed its work. If those guilty of criminal conduct, who defrauded their Government in time of war, are to be prosecuted and made to suffer for their crimes, it will have to be as a result of the action of the Department of Justice, for we are without jurisdiction. If those who secured from the Government money to which they were not entitled are required to pay that money back into the Public Treasury, it will have to be by civil actions instituted by the Department of Justice. The testimony taken by the committee has pointed the way. It is now up to the Attorney General. [Applause on the Republican side.]

CONCLUSION.

The testimony shows that interested parties operating through the committees of the Council of National Defense got control of governmental distributing agencies during the war; that they supplanted regularly constituted agencies of the Government; that instead of being unprepared, without any facilities, as was claimed, as the interested parties would have it appear, we did have in the War Department corps organized and trained to meet the emergency, especially in regard to the construction of camps to house our troops. We had the Engineer Corps; we had the Quartermaster Corps; we had plans and material lists for shelters; we had labor surveys in every zone in which a camp was to be constructed. We had everything that was necessary to proceed with emergency construction without the necessity for any outside agency intervening. But, with the approval of the Secretary of War, the agencies of the Government were thrown into the discard. The cost-plus system, which was condemned by such men as Gen. Goethals, was the result.

The majority members of the committee estimate that at the lowest amount the cost-plus system totaled a loss to the Government of $78,531,521 on the 16 National Army cantonments alone. What the operation of the cost-plus system cost the Government in the aggregate in all branches of activity during the war will never be known, but the loss, according to the facts developed by our committee is, to say the least, stupendous. The inauguration of the cost-plus system not only cost millions in money, but because of the delay resulting in the construction of the camps it caused great suffering among our soldiers.

The majority contends that the delay in emergency construction was at least 50 per cent, and that the money lost due to waste, extravagance, and idleness was from 30 per cent to 50 per cent.

The testimony is not to be refuted that the morale of labor of all classes employed in the camps was reduced at least 50 per cent. The cost-plus system caused a riot of waste and extravagance which is revolting to contemplate. When the American people were being counseled by the Government to economize; when all Americans were being asked to contribute their part toward the Great War by purchasing Liberty bonds, buying war-saving stamps, helping the Red Cross, and all such worthy projects; during the period when the patriotism of the American people, as exhibited by their actions as well as their words, had no parallel in the history of the world; when they were responding to every call, relying upon the honor and the good faith of those who were conducting the affairs of the Government; when American soldiers were fighting in the trenches at $30 a month, being drafted from civil life and making the great sacrifice in business and opportunity that they might serve their country; during a time when the spirit of patriotism was running high, the black hand of the profiteer was reaching into the American Treasury and taking out millions upon millions of dollars.

The people were told to economize while the profiteers were allowed to spend. The idea of economy in expenditures was entirely disregarded. No attempt was made at saving anywhere.

You are paying and your children and your children's children for generations to come will pay and continue to pay for the cost-plus system. Let us hope that never again in the history of the Republic will such a reprehensible system be put into operation, and if the labors of this committee have accomplished that result we will be content. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and two members present, a quorum. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] is recognized for two hours.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, this is a momentous occasion in the life of the Republic. On this day our reconstruction Congress pauses in its tortuous and questionable career to add another chapter to that celebrated historical work entitled "How America Lost the War," written by Hon. WILLIAM J. GRAHAM, of Illinois, and his nine unprejudiced, disinterested, nonpartisan Republican collaborators.

During the past nine months I have been associated with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH] in an investigation of the most successful building program in the history of the world.

It will aid us in reaching a right understanding of this subject if we will try to contemplate the conditions that confronted the Government in the spring of 1917. War was declared on the 6th of April. A bill was introduced in the House for the conscription of the Army, and it became operative on the 18th day of May. In accordance with the plans of the War Department it then became necessary to select 16 sites in various parts of the country for the National Army cantonments.

The task of selecting these sites was intrusted to the commanding generals of the several departments. The commanding general appointed boards, upon each of which were an engineering officer and a medical officer, to aid him in the selection of the proper sites. The commanding generals made their recommendations to the Secretary of War, through the General Staff, and if these recommendations were satisfactory to him the sites were approved.

In the selection of the camps for the National Guard the same method was pursued. These were selected in the South, for climatic reasons, the thought being that the National Guard, being already an organized force, could be trained in tent construction rather than wood construction, and that the warmer climate of the South would be preferable to that of the North in winter weather. There is no testimony anywhere in the record that in the selection of these sites, either in the North or in the South, sectional considerations influenced the choice of the department commanders, the boards that cooperated with them, or the Secretary of War.

The sites for the 16 cantonments for the drafted army were approved by the Secretary of War between May 31 and June 27. Between those dates and the 1st of September the War Department was required to build 16 cantonments to accommodate the first increment of the drafted army and provide them with shelter, light, roads, water, sewers, and sanitation.

Great as it was, this task was but a small part of the Government's building program. Including the 16 camps for the National Guard, it was but one-third of the job that faced the construction division of the Army alone. If to those we add the tremendous building activities of the Ordnance Department, the Navy, the Aircraft Board, the Housing Corporation, and the Shipping Board, we may gather some conception of the construction program of the Government in the spring and summer of 1917. It was a program that challenged not only the organizing genius of the country's builders and engineers, but was destined to tax the resources of the country as well. The draft law was taking many thousands from the field of labor, and the extraordinary demand for lumber and other materials occasioned by this great program further complicated the situation.

The investigation of subcommittee No. 2 was confined to camps and cantonments, and it is my purpose to discuss the building program as it applied to them, including the adoption of the cost-plus system, the contract that was entered into, and the results obtained. Later I hope to consider in some detail the majority report, its findings and recommendations.

The construction of these camps was but one link in a chain of operations that in 16 months sent 2,000,000 of our young men to France and crushed the military power of Germany. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In these camps our soldiers received six months' training before going to France, and when the armistice was signed 2,000,000 more were under training.

We all remember the last drive of the German Army toward Paris and the Channel ports in the spring of 1918 and Hindenburg's ominous declaration, "The thing is over; we are on our way." Nor do we forget in these days when criticism of the conduct of the war seems to be regarded as the acme of statesmanship by those who hope to profit by the mistakes of others the historic exclamation of Lloyd-George, "It is now a race between Hindenburg and Wilson." Nor shall we ever cease to recall with pride and satisfaction that in those dark days, when the destiny of nations was in the balance and the star of civilization hung low, we were able to answer the call of the Allies by sending from these camps to the battle front a victorious army of over 300,000 men per month. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This army could not have been trained without shelter, water, and sanitation. A breakdown or even partial failure of the building program in the summer of 1917 might have meant victory for Germany and disaster to the cause of civilization.

There can be no doubt that the emergency justified the Secretary of War in abandoning peace-time methods of construction. I think that all unprejudiced men feel the same way about it. I am willing to go further, and say that if Secretary Baker had attempted to build those camps by the competitive system he would have been guilty of the grossest incompetence and merited removal from office. The majority report says that the Secretary of War must bear the responsibility for this building program. I quite agree with the majority, and I have no doubt the Secretary of War will be not only glad but proud to carry the burden.

The majority also finds that, in addition to the responsibility resting upon the Secretary of War for permitting the departure from established peace-time methods of construction, direct responsibility must rest upon Col. W. A. Starrett, chairman of the committee on emergency construction. Let us analyze this for a moment. Our hearings show that the emergency contract, which is so viciously attacked by the majority of this committee, was approved by the following-named gentlemen, who participated in the discussions in the meetings of the General Munitions Board:

Admiral W. S. Capps, Bureau of Construction and Repair, Navy Department; Mr. Orlando Weber, of the war materials section of the War Industries Board; Col. F. G. Hodgson, Quartermaster Corps, War Department; Paymaster J. H. Hancock, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, Navy Department; Admiral H. H. Rousseau, Bureau of Yards and Docks, Navy Department; Dr. Franklin Martin, Council of National Defense; Col. H. Fisher, Medical Corps, War Department; Dr. R. C. Holcomb, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, Navy Department; Col. W. B. Dunn, of the Ordnance Department; Admiral A. W. Zane, of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, Navy Department; Col. F. E. Blunt, of the Ordnance Department; Maj. P. E. Pierce, of the General Staff, War Department; Commander R. H. Leigh, of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, Navy Department; Gen. J. B. Aleshire, representing the General Munitions Board, priority, Council of National Defense; Maj. Charles Wallace, of the Signal Corps, War Department; Mr. L. McH. Howe, of the office of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Mr. Frank A. Scott, chairman of the General Munitions Board, Council of National Defense; and Mr. H. B. Bingham, assistant secretary of the General Munitions Board.

All of these gentlemen gave their approval to the cost-plus contract for the construction of these camps. The record shows that this contract was considered in every detail and was approved only after the most thorough consideration. According to the majority, Col. Starrett must have been a wonderful personage. If all the things said of him are true, then, indeed, there could have been applied to him in 1917 the line from Shakespeare—

"He doth bestride the narrow world like a Colossus."

He must not only have reduced to a state of mental vassalage the representatives of the Navy Department, the War Industries Board, the Quartermaster Corps, the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, the Bureau of Yards and Docks, the Council of National Defense, the Medical Corps of the War Department, the Ordnance Department, the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy, and the Signal Corps, but also brought the Secretary of War under his hypnotic sway.

Last summer the chairman of the Select Committee on War Expenditures gave out a statement to the press, in which he declared in substance that the Council of National Defense was the "invisible government" that was conducting the war, and that this "invisible government" had supplanted the duly constituted authorities, and my good friend from Ohio, Mr. McCULLOCH, reiterates it this morning. In the meetings that were held to consider the cost-plus system of building camps, we get a glimpse of this "invisible government" in action. We see it surrounded by representatives of the War and Navy Departments and every branch and bureau of the Government interested in building operations and the health and comfort of our soldiers, sailors, and marines. We see men like Gen. Goethals invited to attend its deliberations. We see its recommendations reduced to writing and filed with the permanent records of its meetings. We see these recommendations transmitted to the Construction Division of the War Department, and then to the Secretary of War for his approval. To make this invisibility more pronounced, we see its members haled from time to time before committees of Congress during the war and its operations heralded through the press to the uttermost corners of the land. Wonderful invisible government! But invisible only to those who would rob it of its fair share of credit in the winning of the Great War. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The majority would have us believe that Gen. Littell, at that time Chief of the Construction Division of the War Department, was induced to approve the cost-plus contract through the misrepresentations of Col. Starrett in a memorandum to Col. Littell May 31, 1917. Yet the testimony shows that on May 5 Col. Littell, in a memorandum to Col. Starrett, objected to the contract, because he understood that it provided for a 10 per cent fee, and when informed that it provided for a sliding scale of fees with a maximum upset fee his objections were removed. Gen. Littell testified before your committee as follows:

"Gen. LITTELL. As I stated at the beginning, when we understood from these rumors that it was to be a cost-plus 10 per cent contract we were concerned about it, and Capt. Oury and I talked it over and reached the conclusions that were in that letter. I do not know whether Capt. Oury ever changed his mind about it or not, but after I saw the contract in full as approved, with the limitations and the scaling down of the percentages, my objections to it were removed.

"Mr. McCULLOCH. Entirely removed?

"Gen. LITTELL. In our particular case; yes, sir."

The cost-plus system, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] has so severely condemned, was also approved by the country's ablest engineers, architects, and builders.

The reasons that led to the adoption of this plan are well stated by Mr. Frank Scott, chairman of the General Munitions Board.

I judge from the majority report that they entertain a very high opinion of Mr. Scott, and his testimony is particularly interesting at this juncture on that account. He testified as follows:

"Mr. SCOTT. The testimony of builders and engineers and contractors who came daily to the rooms of the General Munitions Board or to the Quartermaster General's office and to the office of the Secretary of War—and I encountered them in all those places—was to the effect that if we waited until the General Staff located the cantonments and until contractors had a chance to examine the cantonment sites and until the Quartermaster General's Department and the engineers' department completed the specifications for the cantonments and until those gentlemen had time to figure those specifications and the quantities of material necessary and deliver all those materials on the ground, that if we waited for those things to be done it was going to be absolutely impossible to get the cantonments well under way before winter. That would make it impossible for the General Staff to call the troops, or else they would have to call troops and the boys would have frozen to death in the camps. That was what was stated to us by everybody who assumed to have an opinion at the time."

Mr. Leonard Metcalf, the well-known civil engineer, of Boston, Mass., whose ability and integrity will be questioned by no one and whose ripe experience carries respect for his judgment, testified that it would have been impossible to build the cantonments by the established peace-time methods and have them ready for the troops in September. Speaking to this point, Mr. Metcalf said:

"Moreover, to have done the work in that way would have involved, as we believed, six weeks' delay. It would not have been possible to have assembled the essential information and gotten plans out on which to have gotten competitive bids on the work, and then let the contract. The organization of forces under that system would have resulted in a delay of at least not less than six weeks."

Of course, Mr. Metcalf, a man of 30 years' experience in construction work, does not know as much about this business as some of the men sworn at Chillicothe and Columbus, Ohio. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"It might as well have been two months. Now, that was out of the question. You could not take two out of the three months for bidding and build those camps. Moreover, to have submitted the construction of these camps to competitive bidding on short notice with ill-prepared plans would have meant and would of necessity have resulted in the receiving of many bids from men who could not have had the experience, or who were not prepared and perhaps not competent to do the work on such a scale with such a time limit."

This is the testimony of a man of many years' experience with construction work. On water-works problems he has advised organizations in 140 or 150 cities. He has worked with San Francisco, Denver, Indianapolis, Scranton, Wilkes-Barre, San Antonio, and Tampa, and is now serving either in water-works or sewage problems the cities of Dayton, Milwaukee, Cleveland, and a number of others.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOREMUS. No, I will not yield now; I may later on. Testifying with reference to the hazards involved in building at that time, Mr. Metcalf said—of course, there are some of us who put a little reliance upon the testimony of a man like Metcalf whether the majority do or not:

"The first and foremost one was the uncertainty of the labor situation. The contractors felt that very keenly. That, of course, was aggravated by the Government's own business. They had not the machinery to carry on such a work as lay before the Government. It resulted, of course, in the Government's bidding against itself on the local available labor supply. Take the situation down about Norfolk; five or seven different pieces of work were running into millions of dollars and they were bidding for the same labor, with the result that it made the position of the builders exceedingly difficult. There was a second consideration that materials were not available. Certain kinds were scarce in certain localities.

"And then there was the third difficulty of the railroad situation, which was quite a grave situation. I think the worst conditions existed at Alexandria, which seemed to be the neck of the bottle, and of course you know a great deal of the materials were shipped by trucks that should have gone by rail. We simply did not have the facilities, so that the question of materials and the question of labor both, as well as transportation, constituted great hazards from the bidding point of view. That is the contractor's point of view."

Mr. George W. Fuller, consulting engineer of 30 years' experience, testified with like effect. He has specialized in municipal engineering, particularly in connection with water supply and sanitation.

The majority have no word of complaint against Mr. Fuller. I think in their report they gave him credit for being a conscientious and competent man.

Mr. Fuller has been connected with more than 150 water supply and sewage projects for cities and towns in this country and to a limited extent with projects outside of this country. For 12 or 15 years he has been consulting engineer for the Catskill water supply project for the city of New York and advised the District of Columbia regarding the filtration of the Potomac River water in 1901. He has been connected with many large sewage-disposal projects and sewage systems in our largest cities.

The War Department apparently was paying more attention to sanitation in 1917 than it was in 1898. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Metcalf, Mr. Fuller, and Mr. Asa E. Phillips, all members of the American Society of Civil Engineers, were appointed on a subcommittee on preliminary planning, sanitation, and engineering relative to cantonment construction. The testimony clearly shows that at every stage of the proceedings the War Department had the cooperation of the country's ablest men, and that they rendered valuable service in solving the difficult problems of war construction. I repudiate and denounce as unsupported by the testimony and entirely unworthy of belief the claim advanced by the majority that these men who came to the assistance of the Government in a great emergency were primarily interested in getting business for themselves and their clients. I will not permit a great achievement to be smeared with loose and irresponsible allegations of graft and fraud without voicing an emphatic protest.

It is a very easy thing for men who assumed no responsibility for that building program—the like of which had never been undertaken before—to criticize the methods adopted and those who conceived and put them into execution. If the Supreme Architect of the Universe had built those camps, our bleacher managers would have found fault with the job. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When men seriously contend that peace-time methods should have been followed in carrying out this program, I wonder if they realize that this country was in the midst of the greatest war of history. In 1898 President McKinley appointed a commission to investigate the conduct of the War Department in the War with Spain. Many of you will recall the horrors of camp life in that war, particularly at Chickamauga Park and Montauk Point. The report of this commission contains some very interesting reading. For instance, in volume 1, at page 128, we find this observation: "To clothe and equip 275,000 soldiers was a massive undertaking." Well, assuming that it was a massive undertaking, what adjective shall we select to indicate the magnitude of a task that required the clothing, equipping, sheltering, and training of over 4,000,000 men? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the views of the majority as to competitive bidding for the cantonment contracts had been adopted, the whole building program would have collapsed, our boys would have perished with cold or died of disease in the winter of 1917, and the Germans would have been in Paris before the American Army could have reached the battle lines.

Let us examine briefly the form of the emergency construction contract which is so frequently referred to in the majority report as a "wide-open" contract which left the Government wholly unprotected against the rapacity of contractors. If the contract was wide open, as the majority allege, and if under it the contractor had unlimited license to swell the cost of construction for the purpose of increasing his fees, those who were responsible for its adoption should receive our severest censure. If, on the other hand, the contract was drawn with every safeguard included for the protection of the Government—which is a matter of fact to be determined by an examination of the contract itself—they should be commended.

I shall not attempt to examine the contract in detail. It may be found in the majority report and the minority views, and I invite a careful inspection of its provisions. This contract, among other things, provided:

1. That the contractor was subject in every detail to the supervision, direction, and instruction of the contracting officer representing the Government.

2. The contract reserved in the Government the right to make changes in the drawings and specifications, issue additional instructions, require additional work, or direct the omission of work previously ordered, and its provisions applied to all such changes, modifications, and conditions. It was made the duty of the contractor to comply with all such written instructions or drawings.

I want to refer just for a moment to the argument of Mr. McCULLOCH over the omission from this contract of the bonus for savings and penalty for overtime clauses. That is discussed in the minority views. I simply wish to emphasize at this point that under article 1 of this contract these clauses could not have been inserted, and I challenge anybody to show how they could have been made operative. As to the penalty for overtime which these gentlemen say should have been inserted in this contract, there is no contractor in America who would have taken a contract under which he could be penalized for overtime when the Government had the power to issue additional instructions, require additional work, or direct the omission of work previously ordered. There can be no question about that.

3. The contractor could make no expenditures for either labor or material without the approval or ratification of the contracting officer.

4. The contractor could make no departure from the standard rate of wages being paid in the locality where the work was done without the prior consent and approval of the contracting officer.

5. The contractor could pay rentals for machinery and equipment only in accordance with the scale of rates attached to and made a part of the contract.

6. The overhead items upon which the contractor was entitled to a fee were set forth in the contract, with an express provision that no interest on capital employed or on borrowed money should be included in the cost of the work.

7. The contractor was required to take advantage to the extent of his ability of all available discounts, and when unable to take such advantage was required to promptly notify the contracting officer of his inability and his reasons therefor.

8. The contract fixed a maximum upset fee of $250,000, with an express provision that in no event should the contractor's fee exceed that sum.

9. In case of dispute as to any item or items of expenditure the decision of the contracting officer was to govern.

10. The system of accounting to be employed by the contractor required the approval of the contracting officer.

11. The Government reserved the right to terminate the contract upon five days' notice if the contractor refused, neglected, or failed to prosecute the work with promptness and diligence or defaulted in the performance of any of the agreements contained in the contract.

12. If conditions arose which, in the opinion of the contracting officer, made it feasible or necessary to cease work, the right was reserved in the Government to abandon the work and terminate the contract.

13. The contractor was to furnish a bond in the sum of $250,000, conditioned upon the full and faithful performance of all the terms, conditions, and provisions of the contract.

14. In the event of any dispute over wages, hours, or other conditions appertaining to the work, the contractor was required to comply with the instructions of the contracting officer with reference to the settlement of such disputes.

15. The contractor could not enter into any subcontract for any part of the work without the written approval of the contracting officer.

16. If the contractor felt aggrieved by any decision of the contracting officer regarding the interpretation of the contract, he had the right to appeal to the Secretary of War, whose decision was final and binding upon both parties to the contract.

It will be seen that this contract gave the Government absolute control over every phase of construction. The labor pay rolls and invoices for material and equipment required the approval of the representatives of the Government. The contractor was powerless to increase wages without the prior approval of the representatives of the Government. The construction quartermaster fixed the rate of wages that the contractor could pay and approved the purchases of all materials. The contractor had no discretion in the matter of wages or prices of materials. In short, under this contract, which the majority contends was designed in the interest of the contractor and left him with a free hand to swell the cost of construction, the Government controlled everything, even to the minutest detail, and the contractor controlled nothing.

Under the sliding scale of fees fixed in the contract for building these cantonments the contractor had earned his maximum fee when the cost of the work reached the sum of $4,166,000. The cost of work on all of these 16 original projects was more than twice that amount. The testimony shows that both the contractor and the men representing the Government knew at the outset that the cost would be far in excess of that amount. The maximum fee that the contractor could by any possibility earn under this contract was assured in the beginning. Even though the contract had enabled the contractor to intentionally and willfully increase the cost of the work, what incentive did he have for doing it? If we assume that the contractor was wholly unpatriotic and was actuated solely by a desire to feather his own nest, not even his self-interest could have been a motive for increasing the cost of this work to the Government. In brief, his maximum fee was established at the outset, and under the provisions of the contract could not be exceeded.

The majority can not escape the irresistible force of this conclusion. In an attempt, however, to minimize its effect upon this controversy, it placed in the record a large list of contracts under which the contractor did not earn his maximum fee. An examination of the record, however, discloses that none of them was for original cantonment construction. The testimony of Col. Shelby, of the construction division, shows that in this list of contracts under which the maximum fee was not earned there was included all small contracts which were made at the beginning of the period before the original form of contract had been changed. For instance, at each one of the 32 cantonments and camps there was a separate road contract. The amount of funds available for that work varied from $45,000 to $75,000 for each camp and cantonment. While the contract for road construction was in the beginning made on the same forms that were used for cantonment construction, which contained a maximum fee of $250,000, as a matter of fact the entire cost of the road work was much less than that amount, and the fee earned was $5,000 or $6,000. Included in that list were 182 contracts that were at the height of their progress when the armistice came. These contracts were either entirely abandoned or settled under provision 8 of the contract. (Hearings, p. 2843.)

Having examined the reasons which led to the adoption of the cost-plus system and the form of the contract, let me now consider some of the results that were accomplished. The actual work of camp construction was under the direction, supervision, and control of the Construction Division of the War Department. At the beginning of the war this division was in charge of Col. Littell, afterwards general, who was succeeded by Gen. Marshall. In view of the general condemnation of the entire construction program by the majority, it will be interesting to quote a very brief extract from the hearings. On page 2724 I find the following—Mr. McKENZIE is chairman of our investigating committee:

"Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say right here, as an American, of course I am proud, and I think every other American is, of the achievement not only of the Construction Division but of the entire Military Establishment and the American people as a whole, and they only carried out the views of some of us. And the only question involved had been whether the way in which it was done was the only possible way in which it could have been done. We had the Engineer Corps in our Army."

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Is the gentleman quoting from Mr. McKENZIE of the House?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes; the gentleman from Illinois, who is chairman of the subcommittee that conducted this investigation.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], chairman of the subcommittee that conducted this investigation, is not only proud of the record achieved by the Construction Division, but frankly admits that the only question we have been investigating for the past nine months is whether the way in which this work was done was the only possible way in which it could have been done. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

If, as asserted by the majority, the emergency construction committee dominated and controlled the Construction Division of the War Department and usurped its functions, and the chairman of the investigating committee is proud of the achievement of the Construction Division, one is naturally led to inquire what was wrong with the emergency construction committee?

The original 16 cantonments were constructed to accommodate from 37,000 to 46,000 men each, and were provided with hospitals, sewers, water, lighting, and roads. They were equipped to accommodate 649,038 men, or a division of Infantry for each camp, including air squadrons, balloon companies, telegraph battalions, and Artillery. In 9 of the camps there was an additional regiment of Infantry. The following table, taken from the report of the hearings, shows the number of men in each camp for which provision had been made on September 4, 1917:

American Lake, Wash., Camp Lewis	46,000
Annapolis Junction, Md., Camp Meade	15,000
Atlanta, Ga., Camp Gordon	14,000
Ayer, Mass., Camp Devens	16,458
Battle Creek, Mich., Camp Custer	10,000
Chillicothe, Ohio, Camp Sherman	13,800
Columbia, S. C., Camp Jackson	12,500
Des Moines, Iowa, Camp Dodge	15,000
Fort Riley, Kans., Camp Funston	22,800
Fort Sam Houston, Tex., Camp Travis	28,000
Little Rock, Ark., Camp Pike	20,000
Louisville, Ky., Camp Taylor	24,000
Petersburg, Va., Camp Lee	18,750
Rockford, Ill., Camp Grant	14,000
Wrightstown, N. J., Camp Dix	10,000
Yaphank, Long Island, Camp Upton	7,000
Total	287,308

(Hearings, p. 2901.)

By taking Camp Sherman as an example we can obtain a fair idea of the speed with which these 16 cantonments were built. The site for this camp at Chillicothe, Ohio, was approved June 21 and the contract with A. Bentley & Sons Co., of Toledo, was signed June 27. Work was started July 4, and 63 days later—September 5—the camp was ready to receive the first increment of the National Army. The workmen had practically all left the job on October 6. The camp at that time contained 1,300 buildings, and the testimony shows that the average time consumed in construction was from 43 to 52¼ minutes per building, depending upon whether Sundays are included in the calculation.

At Camp Sherman the labor turnover was 48,000 men from the beginning to the end of the original construction. The largest number employed at one time was 11,000. At the Camp Sherman hearings numerous carpenters, teamsters, and other laborers were sworn for the purpose of showing waste of materials and loafing among the men. I shall not attempt to review their testimony in detail. I think it pertinent to observe at this point that the man who was selected to secure these witnesses was the chairman of the Republican committee of Ross County, in which the camp was located. I wish to assert with emphasis that he made no attempt to present both sides of the matter. I wish to assert with equal emphasis that the entire proceedings at Columbus and Chillicothe bear unmistakable evidence that it was a prosecution and not an investigation. That there was a certain amount of loafing at Camp Sherman—particularly in the early stages of the work—there is no doubt. What proportion of this loafing was due to delay in the arrival of materials there is no way to determine. There can be no question that the limited time allowed for the construction of the camp led to a waste of materials that could have been obviated under normal conditions and processes. But that the waste and loafing at Camp Sherman was greatly exaggerated by these witnesses will be apparent to anyone who will read their testimony. That testimony can not be reconciled with the fact that in 63 days from the time work was started the camp was ready for the first increment of the drafted troops, including the installation of an adequate water supply, sewers, lighting, and other utilities.

Of the 48,000 men who were employed at Camp Sherman from the beginning to the end of the work all of them, with the exception of some plumbers from Chicago, were residents of Ohio. That there were some loafers, grafters, and incompetent workmen in this army of men will be conceded.

I want to call your attention to this chart which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] has brought in here. I wonder who prepared it. It is headed, "Labor's record under the cost-plus system at Camp Sherman, Ohio. The average number of carpenters employed from June 21, 1917, the date on which work was started." Who put that in there? I am not going to accuse my friend from Ohio of doing it, because he must have known better. The site was not selected until the 21st of June, the contract was not entered into until the 27th of June, and the work was not started until the 4th day of July. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I would like to know where he gets his figures as to the 75 days. It was not 75 days. It was only 63. That chart does not take into account the fact that it required time to get the organization started. It does not take into consideration the fact that it was necessary to go out onto the farms and into the stores to get men to do that work. It does not take into consideration delays in arrival of material. It does not take any of those things into consideration.

I want to repeat, gentlemen of the committee, that there were 48,000 men on that job, from the first to the last. All of them were citizens of Ohio with the exception of these plumbers from Chicago, and I refuse to indict the citizenship of a great State on that chart or on the testimony dug up by this Republican boss of Ross County. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If anyone doubts that the majority report is about 99 per cent noise and 1 per cent substance, I hope he will read the chapter on recoveries. He will there find that the majority has given serious consideration to the recovery of $78,531,521 from the contractors for the 16 cantonments. This sum represents the majority's estimate of the difference between the actual cost of the camps and what, in the judgment of the majority, they should have cost. They reached their estimate of what the 16 camps should have cost by adopting the estimate of J. P. O'Connor, a Chicago contractor, of the proper cost of Camp Grant, made from a survey of the camp over two years after it was built, and striking an average of the proper cost of all the other camps. If their theory is correct, there was not a competent nor a patriotic contractor on any one of those jobs. In the opinion of the majority recoveries should be attempted from every one of them, ranging from three to five million dollars. The contractor at Camp Sherman, for instance, who swore that his net fee after paying his overhead and the Federal taxes on his profits was $69,736.54, would be called upon to pay into the Treasury the sum of $5,034,095, or nearly one-half the whole cost of the job.

This contention is made in the face of the fact that the expenditures for both labor and material were under the control of the Government, and the actual cost of the 16 cantonments under the original contracts was but 5 per cent in excess of the estimate of the Construction Division.

This particular "recoverable item" is the most fantastic suggestion made since common recoveries were abolished in England. Is there any wonder that the majority did not dare submit their report to a vote of the House?

Now, let us analyze the other chart which my friend from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] has dragged in here. It reads, "$78,000,000 waste." I will now proceed to analyze the testimony of Mr. O'Connor, upon which this chart has been made, and submit to the sober, deliberate judgment of the Members of this House whether it is entitled to any consideration whatever.

Now, Mr. O'Connor is a reputable Chicago contractor. He was recommended to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] by his colleague [Mr. MADDEN]. Mr. McKENZIE wanted someone to go out to Camp Grant and survey that job as it stood, over two years after it was completed, and make an estimate of what he would have been willing to take the job for in the spring or summer of 1917. Of course, it is manifest that no contractor, however reputable, could go on to that job over two years after the event and make an intelligent estimate of what it should have cost in the spring and summer of 1917. On cross-examination he testifies that he knew nothing about the condition of the site when the work was started. He encountered none of the obstacles that were overcome by the contractor. He knew nothing of the problems that were presented. And while I think Mr. O'Connor was an honest witness, I am sure I can demonstrate that neither he nor any other man could have gone to Camp Grant last winter and made an intelligent estimate of what it should have cost in the spring of 1917. He left out of his estimate many very important items. I call your attention to a few of them by quoting from his testimony:

"Mr. DOREMUS. In reaching your conclusion, Mr. O'Connor, that you could have constructed this camp for over $4,000,000 less than was actually expended on it, did you take into consideration any of the material changes which were made, but which were not made at the time you made your estimate?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. You mean on hand at Camp Grant?

"Mr. DOREMUS. Yes, sir.

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir; I did not take that into consideration at all. My figures were made up as though Camp Grant did not exist. They were independent entirely of the existence of the camp.

"Mr. DOREMUS. I am advised by the Construction Division that a very complete inventory of the material and equipment on hand and not erected, made of December 31, 1918, shows $817,523.49 worth of material and equipment on hand, to which should be added freight to the amount of $222,129.21, as I understand it. You have no knowledge of that fact?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No."

I want to recall that at the time Mr. O'Connor gave his testimony at Camp Grant the newspapers carried, in flaming headlines, a story that the Government had been robbed of $4,000,000 by letting this job under the cost-plus system. That story was based upon the testimony of Mr. O'Connor.

Now, what else did Mr. O'Connor leave out? I quote further from the hearings:

"Mr. DOREMUS. In your estimate did you allow anything for cots?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Did you allow anything for refrigerators?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Did you allow anything for laundry equipment?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir. You mean for the housing of the men?

"Mr. DOREMUS. Yes, sir.

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Did you allow for refrigerator machinery?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. Are you able at this time to give us an answer to that question, Mr. O'Connor?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not figure any cots; no.

"Mr. DOREMUS. You figured no refrigerators?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

"Mr. DOREMUS. You figured no laundry equipment?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

"Mr. DOREMUS. You figured on no refrigerator machinery?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

"Mr. DOREMUS. You figured no fire engines?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Fire engines?

"Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

"Mr. DOREMUS. You did not figure on fire extinguishers?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

"Mr. DOREMUS. You did not figure on fire hose?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

"Mr. DOREMUS. If these things all went into Camp Grant, it would be necessary to pay not only the first cost, but also the cost of the labor in distributing and installing these various things; is that correct?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. They would have to be placed around, I suppose.

"Mr. DOREMUS. And they would have to be unloaded?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. In your estimate I think you allow $9,500 for the construction of the post bakery?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir; $9,500.

"Mr. DOREMUS. In that estimate did you allow anything for the bakery equipment?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No; nothing.

"Mr. DOREMUS. You did not allow anything for the special ovens?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Nothing for the equipment; we had no ovens considered at all.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. How much did you allow for the mess hall for the feeding of the employees?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not allow anything for that.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. You realize, of course, that while that work was being constructed there was no water system?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. I realize that.

"Mr. DOREMUS. In view of that form of construction, which was particularly hazardous from the standpoint of fire, I assume that it would have been imperative in order to prevent fire, to keep the lumber, the shavings, and the scraps, and various things on the job, cleaned up daily; is that right?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. You would have to keep the shavings cleaned up.

"Mr. DOREMUS. And if you had undertaken this job, would not you have cleaned up all the scrap material?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, yes; I would have taken the shavings and the small pieces of lumber out of the buildings.

"Mr. DOREMUS. And that would have been true as to all of the approximately 1,500 buildings on the job. Now, would you have made any allowance for the cleaning up on the job?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Not specifically; I did not, but I would take the same precautions that I do in all my buildings that are inflammable. I would keep them sufficiently clean so that there would be no great danger of fire.

"Mr. DOREMUS. As I understand it, you have no item in your estimate to cover that cost?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No; I have not.

"Mr. DOREMUS. How much did you allow for installing kitchen equipment?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Nothing.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Your estimate did not include ranges, steam tables, dishwashers, and the other articles necessary to care for thousands of boarders in a hurry?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not include anything for that.

"Mr. DOREMUS. How much did you allow for storehouses, refrigerators, pantries for commissary purposes——

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Nothing for that.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. Now, in making this estimate you went over this camp personally. You are familiar with the conditions generally there?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir; I went over it personally.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Let us take the largest building in the camp, the laundry, which, as I understand it, is 200 feet by 270 feet. I think your estimate on that building is $51,000.

"Mr. O'CONNOR. That is correct.

"Mr. DOREMUS. You know, of course, that there is a concrete floor in that entire building?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir.

"Mr. DOREMUS. If it should develop, Mr. O'Connor, that the cost of the material alone in that building amounted to $63,260.23, would it make any difference in your estimate?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Not in the construction alone, on what I figured. Does that figure take in equipment—machinery?

"Mr. DOREMUS. Yes, sir.

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, I have no idea as to what the cost actually was of that.

"Mr. DOREMUS. You did not include machinery and equipment in that?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No. This is the building shown on the plan [indicating].

"Mr. DOREMUS. Then, you allowed more for machinery and equipment of the laundry?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Not at all. I figured the excavation trench and footing, excavation, all concrete work for the trenches, and the general concrete work for the floor, which consisted of 4 inches of rough concrete and 2 inches filling up under the wooden floors, and all of the lumber, the trenchers under the washers, the trenchers under the extractors; all of the roofing, novelty siding, and the millwork, and a little hardware, but no equipment, and, of course, not the laundry outfit.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. What can you tell us as to the magnitude of the task of assembling the materials for the buildings of Camp Grant?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. You mean placing them at the different units where needed?

"Mr. DOREMUS. Getting them on the job originally.

"Mr. O'CONNOR. That would be some job.

"Mr. DOREMUS. It would be a tremendous job, would it not?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. It would.

"Mr. DOREMUS. I am informed by the Construction Division of the War Department that Camp Grant alone used 4,353 cars of construction material and equipment up to November 7, 1917, and that at the other National Army cantonments they had received by November 7, 1917, 77,317 cars of similar material, and that the National Guard camps had received 32,041 cars of material. In other words, that would be 109,358 cars of construction material and equipment for the 32 jobs alone. I am also advised that these materials were scheduled, ordered, manufactured, inspected, shipped, and delivered in 145 days. In other words, from June 15 to November 7. What can you state to the committee as to how you regard that sort of a transportation feat?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. I should say it was ably taken care of.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. What sort of heat did you figure on?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. In any of the buildings where there was stove heat we did not include anything in our estimate, any more than we did for cots or furniture.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Do you mean that you did not figure anything for heating purposes?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, we have a general item of over $100,000 for heating, but in different units in the camp there was stove heat.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Then, as I understand you, you did not figure anything for unloading and setting up the stoves, did you, Mr. O'Connor?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. After the construction at Camp Grant was well advanced, the organization of the Army was changed to conform to the units which actual experience in France had shown to be necessary. This involved expensive alterations in the barracks buildings; for instance, the ends of some of the large barracks had to be removed. Then the buildings were extended. The mess halls and kitchens which had been built were dismantled and the partitions were changed. Various other alterations were made necessary by the change in the units of the Army. Did you make any allowance for that?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Of course, if you had received the contract and had been called upon to make these alterations to which I refer, it would have been classed as an extra, would it not?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. How much did you allow, Mr. O'Connor, for building latrines for the workmen, according to the Army plans?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not allow anything for that.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Do you know that over 100 latrines were built at Camp Grant?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No; I did not know that; I knew it would be necessary to build some few of them until the water system was in, or, rather, until part of the water system was in; that is, until they could build them.

"Mr. DOREMUS. How much did you allow for the sanitary squads to operate at the latrines daily, put oil in the stagnant pools, clean up around the kitchen, and look after the incinerators, and cleaning up around the camp?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not allow anything.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. At Camp Grant, I am told, the construction forces for a long time before the troops arrived, covering a period of several months, the contractors handled the garbage and roughage from all the kitchens of the camp. Did you make any estimate for that?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir; I did not.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Are you aware that at the time construction began at Camp Grant there was no water system, and that many wells had to be dug?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir; I knew that.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Did you make an allowance for temporary wells?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir.

"Mr. DOREMUS. You are aware, of course, Mr. O'Connor, that this camp was built upon virgin soil.

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir.

"Mr. DOREMUS. And that much of the territory was covered with forestry which had to be cleared?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not know that, because when I saw it, it was all cleared.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Did not you have in your estimate any allowance for clearing?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Have you an item in your estimate for temporary quarters?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. Did you make any allowance, Mr. O'Connor, for the hire of shifting engines and crews?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Switching engines?

"Mr. DOREMUS. Shifting.

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir; I did not.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. Your water systems required a maintenance force to take care of the leaks, and the contractor was required to do that work. Did you make any allowance for that?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. Not to take care of leaks; no, sir.

"Mr. DOREMUS. Did you allow anything for surface drainage work?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

"Mr. DOREMUS. What is the sump?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. It is usually a hole in the ground. It takes in surface water.

"Mr. DOREMUS. I am told that there were 65 of those on the job, for the purpose of taking care of the surface drainage. Did you make any allowance for that?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. DOREMUS. Did you allow anything for building crossings over the sewer and water trenches in order to distribute your materials?

"Mr. O'CONNOR. No; I did not."

So I could continue, but I will not attempt to go through all of it. I think I have given enough to demonstrate that Mr. O'Connor could not have made an intelligent estimate under the circumstances, and that no man in the world could.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Did Mr. O'Connor make any allowance in a lump sum for any of these things that were left out?

Mr. DOREMUS. No. He left them out entirely.

Mr. MADDEN. And made no allowance for them in any form?

Mr. DOREMUS. He made no allowance for them, and that is the testimony on which this chart is based and on which they are going to get back into the Treasury of the United States $78,000,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Can you imagine anything more ridiculous to be incorporated in a report and brought into this House? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, let us take another item which the majority says should be recovered, and which they want sent down to the Attorney General and have investigated:

"Losses through misclassification and nonclassification of labor, amounting, as to carpenter work alone, to over $400,000 per cantonment; other amounts not determined."

This would bring the amount to be recovered against the contractor at Camp Sherman up to $5,434,095. I have already pointed out that all pay rolls had to be approved by the representatives of the Government before the contractor could pay his men. In this connection I now wish to submit an extract from a sworn statement of Mr. Bentley, the contractor at Camp Sherman, showing how the pay rolls were handled:

"With respect to the pay rolls, the field auditor's department kept the time of all employees, wrote up the pay rolls, and delivered them to us, showing the details of employment, such as the name of each man, the time worked, the rate, and total due.

"We then sent to Chillicothe the currency required to pay these pay rolls; we filled the pay envelopes and delivered them to the field auditor and took his receipts. The field auditor's assistants then paid the men.

"When our work was approximately done, the field auditor made a complete or final audit and prepared what the auditors know as an 'A to H statement.' Two additional similar complete audits were made by the accounting branch of the Construction Division of the War Department and two additional 'A to H statements' were prepared."

Perhaps if we delve far enough into this report we may find enough recoverable items to reimburse the Government for the entire cost of the camp. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Let us take another recoverable item from the majority report:

"Illegal payments made to A. Bentley & Sons Co. on account of the commissary in the sum of $169,372.79."

The facts in regard to the commissary are that the contract for feeding the men was sublet to the American Commissary Co. on a cost-plus basis. Feeding the men was a part of the construction work which the Government was bound to pay, and that was true whether Bentley or his subcontractor fed them. In actual operation it was found, not only at Camp Sherman but at many other camps, that contractors were not properly equipped to feed the army of employees, and, with the approval of the contracting officer representing the Government, the commissary was sublet to concerns who made a business of feeding large bodies of men. The statement of the Camp Sherman contractor is that as many as 6,000 men were fed in 20 minutes. These companies received a fee of 5 per cent of the cost of operation.

The commissary presented one of the most perplexing questions connected with camp construction. Many of them show a loss, occasioned by the rapidly increasing cost of food and a failure to charge the men enough per meal to cover the cost of operation. At Camp Sherman, where the price per meal was fixed at 30 cents, the loss on the commissary was $142,165.71. The testimony of Capt. Dabney, construction quartermaster at Camp Sherman, as well as the testimony of the officers of the Construction Division in Washington, shows that they all knew that the commissary was running behind. It became a question of whether the Government should pocket the loss on the commissary or increase the price of meals to the men, which, in their judgment, would have involved an increase of wages. According to Capt. Dabney, he believed that to increase the wages would have amounted to more than the deficit in the operation of the commissary. Yet the majority soberly insists that a recovery ought to be had on this commissary contract, notwithstanding it was entered into with the full consent and approval of the Government's representatives.

If my computation is correct, I have already squeezed out over $85,000,000 of water from these pretended claims to recovery. While this process could be continued, I think the illustrations already given will serve to show the visionary character of the proposed recoveries. I assert that as to 99 per cent of these alleged recoverable items they are not supported by either the law or the facts.

After nine months of investigation the majority of this committee is unwilling to make a specific recommendation to the Attorney General or a particular allegation of fraud against any person, firm, or corporation. During all of that time they have had access to the records of the Construction Division of the War Department and the emergency construction committee, and unlimited authority from this House to investigate every phase of the construction program. They have employed able investigators and counsel, and no limitation has been placed upon their expenditures. During these nine months they have left no stone unturned in their efforts to discover evidence of fraud and graft, and now they propose to pass the investigation on to the Attorney General. They have brought in a report which they would not dare to submit to a vote of the House, because it contains findings and recommendations that the House would not approve. The resolution is a confession of failure, and the country will so regard it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the committee rises I shall offer a motion to recommit the resolution and report to the select committee with instructions to bring in a resolution specifying the persons, firms, or corporations which in the opinion of that committee should be investigated by the Attorney General in connection with the construction of these camps [applause], and requesting the Attorney General to institute investigations, either by grand jury or otherwise, for the purpose of beginning criminal or civil proceedings against such persons, firms, or corporations in any case where the facts warrant it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Such a resolution I shall be glad to support.

I would deem these remarks incomplete if I did not reproduce here a paragraph from a memorandum written by Maj. Clair Foster, a member of the emergency construction committee, and which our investigators found sleeping in the records of that committee:

"This stream of callers which flowed through the office of the committee on emergency construction was composed largely of the clear waters of marked ability, appreciation of the Government's predicament, understanding of the Government's necessities, the will and capacity to meet the Government's needs; but on the surface of this stream there bobbed and jostled and swirled always the flotsam of incapacity and ignorance and intolerance and cupidity. To judge of the characters of the waters on the body of the stream by straining the mind's eye for clear spaces in its turbulent surface was a nerve-racking business. There were nights when we went home discouraged in the conviction that there were left no people in the world but the self-seeking. Then would come a brighter day when we could see that there were enough real people left to keep the world moving on its path toward better things."

A strange voice, indeed, to proceed from what our majority associates would have us believe was a den of iniquity. It is with much pleasure that I take these words from the dusty files of the emergency construction committee and incorporate them in the permanent records of the Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I do not regret the part I have taken in this investigation. It has given me a clearer idea of the gigantic task that confronted the Government when war suddenly threw its shadow athwart the path of a peace-loving people. It has given me a keener appreciation of the obstacles that were surmounted and of how a mighty nation arose to its great responsibility when the supreme test of its genius and patriotism came. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and I ask for tellers on that.

The CHAIRMAN. As many as are in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] A sufficient number.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the motion to rise was never put.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois was not recognized to make the motion to rise.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What was he recognized for?

The CHAIRMAN. For the purpose of asking for tellers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but tellers on what?

The CHAIRMAN. On the question of whether there is a quorum present. The gentleman from Illinois moved that the committee do now rise, and then asked for tellers. A sufficient number rose to order tellers, and the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] to act as tellers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but the gentleman from Illinois made the motion to rise. He did not know whether he was going to be successful on that motion or not. At the same time he coupled with the motion a demand for tellers, and he had no right to ask for any such thing.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The object of the gentleman in asking for tellers was to enable a quorum to come in, it being suspected that everyone would vote against the motion to rise.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true; but the question before the committee was the motion to rise.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It never was put.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think I can shorten this matter. I withdraw my request for tellers, and I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, but before the gentleman from Illinois had made any motion to rise I had asked for tellers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Tellers for what?

Mr. KEARNS. To determine whether or not a quorum is present.

Mr. WELLING. Can not the gentleman trust the Chair to count 100 Members?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois and Mr. FLOOD of Virginia) reported that there were—ayes 2, noes 55.

The CHAIRMAN. On this vote there were ayes 2, noes 55, and 8 not voting. Not a quorum has voted, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration H. Res. 515, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he directed the roll to be called, whereupon 261 Members answered to their names, and he presented the names of the absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution 515.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] has 40 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] has 9.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I wish the gentleman from Michigan would yield his time.

Mr. DOREMUS. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Forty minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. I understood the gentleman from Illinois was going to move to rise.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No. After we had consumed two hours' time I thought we would rise.

Mr. FLOOD. Why not rise now?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better go along a while, so that we can get done at a reasonable hour in the morning.

Mr. FLOOD. I misunderstood the gentleman. I understood him to suggest that after the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] got through he would move to rise.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It may be that the gentleman misunderstood me. I have no doubt that is true. But my idea was that, inasmuch as we can not get done to-night, it would take until a quarter past 5 for these gentlemen to finish, and then there would be doubtless two record votes, and it will take us late to get through this afternoon. I conferred with the leaders on my side of the House and reached a sort of tentative conclusion that if you gentlemen could finish to-night the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] could speak in the morning, and we could take a vote in the morning.

Mr. FLOOD. That is very true; you could not. But with 40 minutes on one side and 9 on the other, with an equal amount of time consumed on either side, it would seem only fair to give this side some time to-morrow, and some to the other side.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If you will have one speech on your side we can let it go over, and then have two concluding speeches.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MADDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11578) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. STERLING, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. BECKHAM, and Mr. HENDERSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment to the bill (H. R. 795) for the relief of Arthur Wendle Englert.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate resolution 347.

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow in the death of the Hon. THOMAS STAPLES MARTIN, late a Senator from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, pursuant to its order heretofore made, assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

EXPENDITURES IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask the privilege of extending and revising my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the merits of this report, with which I am not familiar. I desire to call attention for a brief time to the method of procedure proposed.

The resolution before us proposes to turn the evidence and reports over to the Attorney General with a request that he institute grand jury investigations and prosecute "such persons as are guilty of criminal conduct" and bring civil suits to recover funds that have been "fraudulently or illegally paid." No person is named; no particular offense or transaction is identified. The resolution fails to give the slightest information to the Attorney General as to whom or for what he is to prosecute or sue. He is not given the slightest suggestion whether the amount involved is $5,000 or $5,000,000. The only assistance offered the Attorney General is such as he can dig out of over 3,000 printed pages of testimony.

The gentleman from Michigan will offer a motion to recommit with instructions to the committee to report a resolution specifying the persons whom, in their judgment, should be investigated and requesting the Attorney General to prosecute those whose guilt is established, if any, and bring suits to recover any money he may find to have been illegally or fraudulently paid.

I voted for the rule to-day. I shall vote for the motion to recommit.

I believe that the majority should accept the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS]. By doing so they could accomplish more and relieve themselves of the just criticism to which the pending resolution is subject.

There are two legitimate circumstances under which a resolution for the purpose here proposed by the majority might properly be referred to the Attorney General of the United States. The first would be where the evidence clearly establishes criminal or civil fraud. If the evidence in this case showed that somebody had committed a criminal fraud or a civil fraud against the Treasury of the United States, there should be no difference of opinion in this House that such person deserves prosecution. Politics or official position should have nothing to do with it. But if the evidence before the committee does disclose such a case, in my judgment it is clearly the duty of this committee so to declare by the resolution that it adopts. No man whose guilt is established should be shielded by generalities or equivocal language. The other condition under which we would be justified in referring this case to the Attorney General is where there is a doubt either as to the facts or as to the law applicable to the facts. In such a case I think we might legitimately and properly turn over to the Attorney General the evidence in the case, call attention to the circumstances, and ask him to determine whether there is a legal responsibility. We could also request that if he finds a fraud has been committed he should institute criminal or civil action to fix the responsibility, punish the crime, and recover money fraudulently paid.

In this case the resolution proposed recites two circumstances upon which it bases its proposed action. It recites that there is "testimony tending to show that there was criminal conduct" in connection with the emergency construction work; not a declaration that a crime has been committed, but simply that there is "testimony tending to show" that crime has been committed.

In the second place it is recited that "it is alleged that Government funds were fraudulently and illegally paid to contractors." In neither case is there a specific assertion that either a crime or a fraud has been committed.

This committee has been investigating for eight or nine months. It had the opportunity of observing the witnesses and hearing their testimony. Nobody on earth should be in a better position to judge whether or not a crime has in fact been committed or whether a civil fraud has been committed.

This committee was charged with the duty of determining the facts in this case. If this matter is to be referred to the Attorney General, in my judgment it is the plain, practical, common-sense duty of this committee to declare who has committed these crimes, if any, and to ask the Attorney General to prosecute the perpetrators of them. [Applause.]

This resolution proposed by the majority does not say that a single individual in the United States is guilty. But it proposes to turn over 3,000 pages of testimony, the testimony of 170 witnesses, and over 150 pages of report and to tell the Attorney General to prosecute and convict. To prosecute whom? For what? Your resolution does not answer that question.

Now, look at this proposition as a practical one. Apply to it the same standards of procedure and common sense that you would in the practical affairs of ordinary life. If you should go down to the Attorney General's office and hand over to him a report of over 3,000 printed pages of testimony and say, "Prosecute!" would he not have the right to ask, "Whom shall I prosecute, and for what?" But this committee says neither thing. They either do not know or they will not tell.

The substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] is to refer this back to the committee with a request to report to the House, giving the names of persons who have committed these offenses, if any. Then transmit that report to the Attorney General. Let him determine upon the law and the facts, from grand jury investigations and otherwise, whether or not there is a case. Request him, if he finds the facts to justify it, to prosecute every one of the persons so guilty. In my judgment that is the practical thing that should be done in this case.

Here is the situation: If we adopt this resolution, we assign to the Attorney General a serious duty. We can not afford to be anything but serious about a matter of this character. If we are going to assign to the Attorney General a serious duty respecting a possible fraud against the Treasury of the United States committed in time of war, then we should make that duty specific. We should make it so definite and certain that after the Attorney General has concluded his labors we can judge his work. We can say to him, "You have failed to do your duty" or "You have done your duty." But under this resolution the Attorney General might have the ability of a Choate. He might labor with the greatest zeal and skill, and after all is done any Member who voted for this resolution could say, "You have not performed your duty. You did not do what we voted for you to do."

On the other hand, the Attorney General may take this report and the evidence and prosecute some one under it. Every Member who voted for this resolution can go to the man who is prosecuted and say, "We did not vote to have you prosecuted. This is the act of an officious Attorney General." In other words, this resolution is an evasion of duty.

It is not a fair proposition. If we are going to impose a duty upon the Attorney General of the United States, he has a right to know what that duty is. Then he can prosecute those who are actually guilty. If he fails to prosecute anybody whose actions we suggest should be investigated, he can show why he did not do it. That would be a sensible, practical way of getting results, and that should be our purpose.

This resolution in its present form is open to the suspicion that instead of trying to accomplish results we are only trying to make a show—going through the motions of doing something instead of getting down to brass tacks. If we can show that men have committed crimes against the country under pretense of serving our war needs, let us do it.

First of all, be just to the innocent and patriotic who faithfully served our country. Let us hope for no partisan success based on defamation and detraction of patriotic men. Put those men in jail who robbed us and let them be branded with the ignominy that rightfully belongs to them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to yield any further time?

Mr. DOREMUS. As far as I know now there will be but one more speech on our side, and that will be by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to have that understood, that there is only one speech on each side. In view of that, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolution 515, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 13, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the author of all our blessings, we reverently come into Thy presence this morning. We remember our unworthiness to discharge so high an office, to perform so great a task, a task that has for its end the uplift of a Nation, the establishment of justice and righteousness. We invoke Thy mercy. Blot out our transgressions. Fill us with the spirit of the Christ, that we may perform the duties of this day as in Thy sight, and receive Thy blessing upon the work we do. In Thy name we ask it. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, addressed to the Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD, and if there be no objection it will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA,
Washington, April 10, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
President United States Senate.

DEAR MR. MARSHALL: Having been appointed by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America to prepare a statement in regard to America's relation to the problem of establishing peace in the Near East, and particularly in regard to the continuation of the Sultan in Constantinople as the ruler of the Ottoman Empire, we beg your careful consideration of the following points, in stating which we believe that we are voicing the sentiment of the large majority of the religious forces of America:

First. That the purpose which led America into the war was not fulfilled with the cessation of hostilities. Germany has been defeated but autocratic militarism still lives, and is even now manifesting itself in its worst form in the former Turkish Empire, which has been well called the breeding place of atrocities and wars.

Second. That there is a growing impatience amounting to indignation over the failure of the administration and of Congress to concur in enacting such legislation as will enable America to help the allied nations to escape from the political entanglements of the past and to solve the Near Eastern problem according to the principles of right and justice, for the establishment of which we entered the war.

Third. That this impatience is coupled with the sense of humiliation that America by her delay is losing her prestige among the nations and the acknowledged moral leadership which has been accorded her by the peoples of the world, and that she is being accused of self-interest and bad faith.

Fourth. That it is well-nigh, if not actually, impossible for Great Britain and France to meet their present responsibilities which can not be avoided, and much more to assume new ones without America's aid.

Fifth. That cable dispatches from Lord Bryce and other British leaders interested in the Christian peoples of the Near East declare that "unless America joins to help bear the burdens we see no hope of delivering the subject races of Turkey."

Sixth. That the King-Crane, the Harbord, the Near East Relief, and other commissions, public and private, as well as a large number of Americans in the Near East, all agree that America alone is in a position to do with comparative ease what ought to be done in that country for its pacification, for the protection of the people there, and for the setting up of a safe and righteous government.

That many leaders in other countries are of the same opinion, which is also confirmed by practically all the nationalities dwelling in those areas.

That from all these different sources there is general agreement that if America refuses to come to the relief of the situation the Turks will continue to hold sway in Europe and while dwelling in Constantinople will continue to practice officially from that city their characteristically unjust administration and perpetrate their customary atrocities upon their defenseless subjects wherever their rule shall extend.

We therefore appeal to the Government at Washington to recognize America's peculiar opportunity and obligation to help in the solution of this problem, because she, better than any other nation, can take up its consideration with nothing to gain for herself, without arousing suspicion in others and in answer to the practically unanimous call of all the nations concerned, especially those smaller nations that are now awaking to a desire for national independence.

In particular we urge that the weight of America's influence be thrown on the side of a definite and final decision that the Turk should be excluded from Europe and denied control over the subject peoples which he has so long and so brutally oppressed and maltreated.

We believe that we express the opinion of the large majority of those whom we represent when we say that the Christian people of our country, while not coveting for America the responsibility of an advisory or mandatory position, feel that she should not shrink from declaring her willingness to take such an advisory or mandatory responsibility if the allied nations and the peoples of the East should make strong representation that by doing so she could effectively aid them in bringing order out of the chaotic conditions that now exist.

Yours, respectfully,

Rt. Rev. CHARLES S. BURCH,
Bishop LUTHER B. WILSON,
Rev. JAMES L. BARTON,
Rev. ARTHUR J. BROWN,
Rev. STANLEY WHITE,
